[Title Omitted]

MOTION TO SUPPRESS EVIDENCE AND STATEMENT

Now comes Petitioner, GEORGE McCRAY, by and through his attorney SAM ADAM, and states to the Court as follows:

1. That the Petitioner at all times herein mentioned is and has been a citizen of the United States and the State of Illinois.

2. That Petitioner is the Defendant in the above Indictment Number 64-1318 charged with possession of Heroin.

3. That your Petitioner, on or about January 16, 1964, was walking South on South Park Avenue at ap-[fol. 5] proximately 49th Street in the City of Chicago, Illinois.

4. That Police Officers of the City of Chicago whose names are not known to your Petitioner but one of whom your Petitioner believes to be Officer James Arnold of the Chicago Police Department, arrested your Petitioner and search your Petitioner and seized from your Petitioner a certain white powder.

5. That prior to the arrest of your Petitioner, your Petitioner was violating no law, nor had he been violating any law or ordinance of the City of Chicago, the State of Illinois, the United States of America, nor any other soverign.

6. That the aforesaid Officers did not have an Arrest Warrant for the arrest of your Petitioner.

7. That the aforesaid Officer did not have a Search Warrant for the search of your Petitioner.

8. That your Petitioner at no time consented to the search of his person but on the contrary, at all times protested the said search.

9. That after, and as a result of, the aforesaid illegal arrest of your Petitioner, your Petitioner made certain [fol. 6] incriminating oral statements.

10. That the said Arrest, Search and Seizure were illegal and unlawful and in violation of the rights guaranteed your Petitioner by the Constitution of the United States of America and the Constitution of the State of Illinois, to-wit:

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fourth Amendment:

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing a place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."

Fifth Amendment:

". . . No person shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived [fol. 7] of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

Fourteenth Amendment:

". . . Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

THE CONSTITUTION OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS:

Article 2, Section 2:

"No person shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

Article 2, Section 6:

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects against unlawful searches and seizures shall be violated, and no warrant shall issue without probable cause, supported by affidavit, particularly describing the place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."

Article 2, Section 10:

:No person shall be compelled in any criminal case [fol. 8] case to give evidence against himself."

WHEREUPON, your Petitioner, prays that an order may be entered suppressing said property so unlawfully seized and the aforesaid evidence alleged to have been so obtained, and that same be excluded as evidence against him upon his trial, and that the said property be returned to him forthwith.

Transcript of Testimony on Motion

George McCray, first being sworn testified as follows:

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. ADAM

My name is George McCray, 5217 Calumet. I resided there with my uncle on January 16, 1964.

I was arrested January 16, 1964, by Officers Arnold and Jackson. There is Officer Jackson (indicating).

I was arrested about 5:30 in the morning at 49th and Calumet. I came across 48th Street. The Officers stopped me going through the alley. I had not committed a violation of an ordinance or statute when they stopped me. I was walking along the street.

The officers did not show me a search warrant for my person or an arrest warrant for my arrest. The officers searched me. They made me put off my clothes.

When the officers took off my clothes I was standing outside the car. After he had me put on my clothes, [fol. 10] except my pants and shirt he told me to get in the car and finish pulling off my clothes. So he told me to get back out of the car and said he found something. They did not seize anything at that time.

When I got out of the car they said they had found something when I got out of the car they said they had found something.

Q. (BY THE COURT) Did they take anything away from you?

A. No, sir.

* * * *

Q. (BY THE COURT) I am asking you again, do you feel all right?

A. Yes, sir, I feel all right, just sleepy.

* * * *

Q. (BY MR. ADAM): When they had you in the car did they find, did they seize from you a white powder at that time?

A. Yes, sir.

That is the same white powder that is the subject mat-[fol. 11] ter of this indictment.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. ENGERMAN

I don't recall what day of the week I was arrested. I was unemployed.

I was arrested at 5:30 A.M. about 3 blocks from my home. Before my arrest I was at a friend's house, located at 48th and Forrestville. A half hour elapsed between my leaving my friend's house and when I was arrested. I walked from the friend's house across 48th and South Park.

I walked with a lady from 48th to 48th and South Park. I was arrested about a block from my friend's house. The weather was real cold, snow on the ground a half inch deep.

I knew the officers from before that day.

I had on three coats. The officers that arrested me had me take off my clothes. I took off all the coats I had on. They examined the coats. Then they had me get in the squad car. I was on the driver's side of the car in [fol. 12] the back seat. They laid the coats across the front seat. The officers then had me completely undress in the squad car. They made met get out of the car with only my pants half on and my underclothes. The officer had me stand outside. The officer showed me a cigarette package with some tinfoil in it. It was not mine.

I had a little wine before going to court today.

I was drinking last night and didn't go to bed all night.

The Court: I want to know if they did obtain this material from you or whether they did not get it off your person or from your clothing. What do you say?

A. Yes, sir, they had to get it off of me.

* * * *

They got the evidence while searching me. It is my cigarette pack. Whatever is in it belonged to me. Five packs, four large ones and one small one was in the package.

NOTE RE MOTION TO DENY MOTION TO SUPPRESS AND RULING THEREON

Motion by State's Attorney that Motion to Suppress be [fol. 13] denied at close of Petitioner's evidence.

Ruling by the Court that Petitioner had made out a prima facie case in Support of petition to suppress.

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. ENGERMAN

My name is Charles C. Jackson. I am a police officer, City of Chicago. I have been employed approximately six years. I was a police officer on January 16, 1964. I was working with Officer Nance and Office Arnold.

We were in the vicinity of 47th and Calumet and South Parkway on January 16, 1964. I was with Officers Nance, Arnold, and a police informant. We had a conversation with the police informant in the police car in the vicinity of 47th and Calumet.

Q. Approximately how long before January 16, 1964, did you first meet and discuss with this informant narcotic activities?

A. Speaking for myself, approximately one year.

[fol. 14] Q. During that period of a year, approximately how many times did you have occasion to speak to this police informant concerning narcotic activities?

A. Numerous times.

Q. Can you give us a rough approximation?

A. I would say fifteen, sixteen times at least.

Q. During those times you spoke with this police informant, was certain information given to you by this informant concerning narcotic activities?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Did you have occasion, based upon that information, to make any arrests?

A. Made numerous arrests from his information.

Q. Based upon those arrests, to your knowledge have any convictions been obtained?

A. Yes, sir, they have.

Q. Now, the information that was furnished to you in the past by this police informant, have you had occasion to check the information out when it was given to you?

[fol. 15] A. Yes, sir, we have.

Q. Did it prove to be accurate?

MR. ADAM: Objection, Judge, that is a conclusion, an answer to that question.

THE COURT: Overrruled.

THE WITNESS: Yes, sir, it has.

THE COURT: You may cross examine with respect to that.

MR. ENGERMAN: Q. Do you have an opinion, Officer, as to whether this informant would be termed reliable?

MR. ADAM: Objection.

THE WITNESS: I would say—

THE COURT: Wait a minute. There is an objection. What is the basis?

MR. ADAM: In the first place, Judge, reliable. If he is going to say what is reliable, that is a conclusion. Secondly, I don't think this officer is qualified to give an opinion.

THE COURT: He has already said he checked out information and it proved to be accurate. I will sustain the objection.

[fol. 16] On January 16, 1964, I was with the police informant. We had a conversation at that time.

Q. What, if anything, did this police informant tell you?

A. He stated that a man known to me as Boobie George—

Q. Spell that.

A. B-o-o-b-i-e.

—was selling narcotics and had narcotics on his person and that he could be found in the vicinity of 47th and Calumet at this particular time.

Q. Had you had occasion before January 16, 1964, to know of Boobie George?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many Boobie Georges had you heard of prior to January 16, 1964?

A. Only one.

Q. Do you know the correct or real name of the person that you knew before January 16, 1964, as Boobie George?

[fol. 17] A. Yes, sir.

Q. What is that name?

A. George McCray.

Q. Do you see George McCray in the court room today?

A. Yes, sir, I do.

Q. Would you point him out, please?

A. That is the gentleman in the third seat.

MR. ENGERMAN: Indicating, for the purpose of the record, the defendant in this charge, George McCray.

Q. Is that the same person you know as Boobie George?

A. Yes, sir, it is.

Q. Have you had occasion to arrest George McCray before January 16, 1964?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And were those arrests relating to narcotics or use of narcotics?

MR. ADAM: Objection.

The informant directed us to 48th and South Park. We waited there for approximately ten minutes. The in[fol. 18] formant was parked across the street and pointed to George. This is the same George McCray I identified in court. This was approximately 6:55 or 7:00 A.M.

Q. What, if anything, happened after the informant pointed out the defendant, George McCray?

A. The informant left, got out of the car and left. George McCray was in the company of a female. He began to cross South Parkway westward. As he approached the northwest corner of 48th and South Parkway he had a brief conversation with the female. The female walked westward on 48th Street. Mr. McCray then turned south on South Parkway, crossed to the opposite corner. He was met by another male Negro, had a brief conversation with this person. This person left and walked west also on 48th Street.

Mr. McCray then walked south, maybe about two or three doors south on South Parkway into a vacant lot. I [fol. 19] was driving the police vehicle at the time. I drove—

Q. Was this marked or unmarked?

A. Unmarked car. I drove south on the next block, before it. I turned westward, parked at the mouth of the alley; at this point Mr. McCray came out of the alley and also began to walk westward to the alley.

He observed the police vehicle and began to hurriedly walk between two buildings. At this point my partner and myself got out of the car and informed him we had information he had narcotics on his person, placed him in the police vehicle at this point.

Q. What were the weather conditions at this time in the vicinity where you were at?

A. Very cold, very cold.

Q. How was the defendant dressed—strike that. How was Mr. McCray dressed?

A. He had a large heavy overcoat on, had that large sweater.

Q. You stated you had Mr. McCray get into the squad car or into the police vehicle?

A. Yes, sir.

[fol. 20] Q. What occurred when you had him enter the police vehicle?

A. We had informed him we had information he had narcotics on his person. We asked Mr. McCray to take off his coat, and which he began to do, and began acting in a fidgety manner. I was seated on the driver's side, my partner—, Officer Arnold was beside me. Officer Nance was in the back seat.

I got out of the front seat and pulled Mr. McCray out of the back seat, and just between the seats, back seat and the opening to the floor, Officer Arnold recovered a cigarette package containing five medium sized foil wrapped packages.

MR. ENGERMAN: Q. Did you recover this package or Officer Arnold.

A. Officer Arnold.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. ADAM

I did not testify in the Narcotics Court. This is the first time I gave any testimony whatsoever in this case. [fol. 21] We did not have any search warrant for George McCray. At no time did we ever apply to a judge or magistrate for a search warrant or an arrest warrant for George McCray.

We acted solely on the basis of what the informant told us. When McCray was walking on the street he was committing no crime. He was not committing a crime when we saw him with his female companion.

Q. It was cold at that time?

A. Very cold.

Q. Very cold. What is the name of this informant that gave you this information?

MR. ENGERMAN: Objection, Your Honor.

THE COURT: State for the record the reasons for your objection.

MR. ENGERMAN: Judge, based upon the testimony of the officer so far that they had used this informant for approximately a year, he has worked with this indi[fol. 22] vidual, in the interest of the public, I see no reason why the officer should be forced to disclose the name of the informant, to cause harm or jeopardy to an individual who has cooperated with the police. The City of Chicago have a tremendous problem with narcotics. If the police are not able to withhold the name of the informant they will not be able to get informants. They are not willing to risk their lives if their names become known.

In the interest of the City and the law enforcement of this community, I feel the officer should not be forced to reveal the name of the informant. And I also cite People vs. Durr.

THE COURT: I will sustain that.

MR. ADAM: Q. Where does this informant live?

MR. ENGERMAN: Objection, your Honor, same basis.

THE COURT: Sustained.

MR. ADAM: Q. You testified, Officer Jackson, did you not, you talked with this informant about fifteen or six[fol. 23] teen times in the year you knew him?

A. Relative to narcotics.

Q. And you made arrests based on this information?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. How many convictions have you obtained?

A. Off hand I couldn't say. I would say we have obtained numerous, convictions?

Q. By numerous, more than three?

A. Yes.

Q. Could it be more than ten?

A. Yes.

Q. Could it be more than ten?

A. Some of the cases are pending. Convictions, I would say, maybe, approximately five, six, seven.

Q. Five or six or seven arrests—
A. Convictions.
Q. —convictions, based on this information.
Have these convictions all involved narcotics?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Can you give us the name of one defendant that [fol. 24] was convicted based upon the information that the so-called informer or stoll pigeon gave you?
THE COURT: There is no need characterizing him with that picturesque street language.
MR. ADAM: Q. Can you give us the name of one person that was convicted, based upon the information of this so-called police informant?
A. To be correct, at this point, I couldn't.
Q. Well, can you give us the approximate date of the last time?
A. If counsel will pass my testimony a moment I can give you dates and times.
Q. No, as you sit there now can you give us the name of one person that has been convicted, based on the information this particular information this particular informant gave you?
A. Yes, sir, Rhodell Brengettsy.
Q. Do you know tow to spell—
A. Yes, B-r-e-n-g-e-t-t-s-y. First name R-h-o-d-e-l-l.
THE COURT: Is that a male or a female?
THE WITNESS: Male.
[fol. 25] MR. ADAM: Q. What court was he convicted in?
A. Judge Morrissey.
Q. What was the charge there?
A. Possession of narcotics.
Q. Were you the arresting officer?
A. Officer Arnold and myself, yes, sir.
Q. What was the approximate date?
A. A month ago, maybe two or three weeks ago.
Q. Was it during the month of July of this year?
A. It could have been July or June, I don't know.
Q. And what was the charge there?
A. Possession of narcotics.
Q. I see.

A. On two counts.

Q. What was the factual situation regarding the arrest—strike that.

Was the arrest in that case based solely upon the information that your informant gave you?

A. Yes, sir.

[fol. 26] There was also a Robert Lee Smith. You asked for convictions. I am trying to recollect names.

Q. Robert Lee Smith?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. When was he convicted?

A. I think it was in the month of May, May or April.

Q. Of this year?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What court was that?

A. I don't remember, actually, what court it was in. I recall there was a search warrant issued. He was found guilty and given probation because of his background.

Q. You don't remember the judge at that hearing?

A. At this point I don't recall, no, sir.

Q. Was that search warrant procured as a result of this informant?

A. Yes.

Q. Was this informant named in the search warrant?

[fol. 27] A. Yes.

Q. Was his correct name stated?

A. He signed his name.

Q. Was it his correct name?

A. He signed his name.

Q. Was it his correct name?

A. As far as I know.

Q. In this Rhodell Brengettsy case, did the informant appear and testify?

A. No, he did not.

Q. You appeared and testified?

A. Yes, sir, I did.

Q. In the Robert Lee Smith case, did the informant appear and testify?

A. No, sir, he did not.

Q. Going back to the Brengettsy case, did you testify in that case that you had received information from this informant?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Has this so-called informant ever appeared in court on cases in which you are involved?

A. Not that I can remember.

Q. So, in other words, the cases you have been in[fol. 28] volved in, he has always remained in the background and given you information?

A. We still have cases pending that—

MR. ADAM: I disclaim that answer, Judge.

Q. The question is, in the cases that you have used this informant here, he has never appeared to date, has he?

A. Not to date.

DIRECT EXAMINATION BY MR. ENGERMAN

My name is James W. Arnold. I am a police officer, city of Chicago. I have been a police officer for almost seven years.

I was working with Officers Charles Jackson and Willie Nance. On January 16, 1964, I was in my automobile with Officers Jackson, Nance, and a special employee. We had a conversation with the special employee in the vicinity of 47th and Calumet. I have known the police informant roughly two years.

I had talked to him prior to January 16, 1964. I have [fol. 29] spoken to him at least 50 times concerning narcotics. He has given me information concerning narcotics about 20 or 25 times. I have made an arrest solely upon the information furnished me by this informant. I have secured convictions based upon the information given to me by this informant. The special employee stated that a male Negro known to him as Boobie George was selling narcotics and had narcotics on his person now in the vicinity of 47th and Calumet.

I knew a man on January 16, 1964, by the name of Boobie George. His right name is George McCray. I see him here in court. I have seen George McCray 40 or 50 times prior to January 16, 1964.

Q. What, if anything, did you do after receiving the information from this police informant?

A. The two officers and myself, along with the special employee, drove around the block and we didn't see him immediately.

[fol. 30] Q. By him, who do you refer to?

A. Mr. McCray.

The special employee stated "Go over to South Park on the service drive and go midblock and park." Because Boobie George lived just south of this. We did not know the correct address. Officer Jackson was driving. We parked approximately mid-way of the service drive.

Q. Was there any conversation?

A. None, other than after we parked, but he said, "there is Boobie now."

Q. Did the special employee stay in the car or leave?

A. He got out of the car.

Q. What occurred after the special employee or informant left the automobile?

A. After the special employee left the car Mr. McCray, in the company of a female Negro, was walking west on 48th Street across South Park. They stopped in the northwest corner of the service sidewalk and had a brief con[fol. 31] versation. She continued west on 48th Street. Mr. McCray went south across 48th on South Park as far as the drive, met another male Negro and had a conversation. This male Negro walked west.

Mr. McCray walked across on the service drive approximately three or four doors, went in a southwesterly direction through a vacant lot. Officer Jackson drove the car to 49th and South Park and parked at the mouth of the alley. Mr. McCray was walking south through the alley and Officer Jackson proceeded to drive into the alley.

Mr. McCray, looking up, saw this squad car. He began to walk hurriedly between two buildings at about 4847-49 South Calumet. When I stopped Mr. McCray, I said "Boobie—" that is what I called him—"Boobie, you have been identified and pointed out as having narcotics on your person now."

He said, "You know I am not silly enough to walk with violations on me on the street."

I said, "If you are clean you will have nothing to [fol. 32] worry about."

Officer Jackson parked the car at this vicinity. I got out of the car and had this conversation with him.

He said, "Go ahead and search me. You know I am not crazy enough to walk on the street with violations on me."

The weather was extremely cool. He had, I believe it was a three-quarter length coat, a sweater, maybe several sweaters, on him. I said, "Get in the car. It is too cold out."

He got in the car, removed the outer coat only. His left sleeve, as we were having a conversation at the car, he put his left arm like in this manner, and moved it in a motion, like this.

MR. ENGERMAN: Indicating, for the record, the left hand extended, bent at the elbow, and the inner portion of the hand facing toward the rear.

THE WITNESS: That's right.

MR. ENGERMAN: And the arm bending towards the rear from the elbow.

[fol. 33] THE WITNESS: That is right.

I recovered the cigarette package with five foil-wrapped packages. After I observed this cigarette package, I asked Mr. McCray to step out of the car.

CROSS EXAMINATION BY MR. ADAM

I did not have a search warrant for George McCray. I did not have no arrest warrant for George McCray. I did not see him in the commission of any crime. Neither my partners, nor myself have a search warrant for George McCray. We encountered the informant at approximately 6:00, between 6:50 and 6:55 a.m. We encountered him at 47th and Calumet. He came up and got into the car.

Q. At that time you, the informant, Officer Jackson and Officer Nance were in the car, is that right?

A. Yes sir.

Q. Now, to the best of your recollection what did that [fol. 34] informant say to you at that time?

A. He stated that Boobie George was selling narcotics and had the same on his person in the vicinity of 47th and Calumet.

Q. What did you say?

A. And I said—

Q. What did you say at that time?

A. I asked him how did he know that, that he had it on his person now. He said he observed him sell narcotics to various people.

Q. Various people. Then what did he say then, if anything?

A. We discussed it generally for a second or two and he suggested that we drive around the block and see if we could see him.

Q. Officer, has this informer appeared in court on cases which you have been a police officer, with you?

A. No, sir, there has never been any need.

Q. That is not the question.

A. No, sir, he has never appeared, no.

[fol. 35] Q. He has never appeared. What is his name?

MR. ENGERMAN: Objection, Your Honor.

THE COURT: Sustained.

MR. ADAM: Q. What is his address at the present time?

MR. ENGERMAN: Objection.

THE COURT: Sustained.

MR. ADAM: Q. The sole reason for you stopping and arresting the defendant, George McCray, at approximately 7:00 a.m. the morning of January 16, 1964, was upon information by this person who is not present in court today, is that correct?

A. That is correct, sir.

MR. ADAM: No further questions.

MR. ENGERMAN: Nothing further.

MR. ADAM: All right, Judge I would like to recall the defendant—I am sorry, I thought the State—

THE COURT: When you asked the special employee, "How do you know Boobie George has narcotics on his person now?" what did he say?

[fol. 36] THE WITNESS: He said he had observed him selling narcotics to various people, meaning various addicts, in the area of 47th and Calumet.

THE COURT: Did you ask him anyt additional questions?

THE WITNESS: Yes, sir.

THE COURT: Did you ask him when he saw these sales made?

THE WITNESS: Yes, sir.
THE COURT: What did he say?
THE WITNESS: He stated just prior to him meeting us.
THE COURT: Did he say he had seen these sales?
THE WITNESS: Yes, sir.
MR. ENGERMAN: I have no further questions.

(Witness excused.)

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS

Docket No. 38941—Agenda II—March 1965.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS, APPELLEE

GEORGE MCCRAY, APPELLANT

OPINION—May 20, 1965

Mr. JUSTICE SOLFISBURG delivered the opinion of the court:

This appeal presents the question of the validity of an arrest by a police officer without a warrant based upon information supplied by an unidentified informant. Defendant, George McCray, was tried before a judge of the circuit court of Cook County on a charge of unlawful possession of narcotics, found guilty, and sentenced to a term of from two years to two years and one day.

On this appeal defendant seeks reversal on the sole ground that his constitutional rights were violated by the introduction into evidence of narcotics found on his person at the time of his arrest.

Prior to trial defendant filed a motion to suppress the evidence of the narcotics. In support of the motion defendant testified that on January 16, 1964, he had just left a friend's house at 5:30 A.M. and was walking on 49th Street and Calumet Avenue in Chicago when he was arrested by police officers without a warrant. He was searched and police seized narcotics from him.

Charles Jackson, one of the arresting officers, testified that he and officers Arnold and Nance met with an informant at 47th and Calumet on the morning of the arrest. He stated that he had known the informant for approximately one year and had talked to him many times securing information regarding narcotics and that the information received resulted in numerous arrests and at least 6 or 7 convictions. He stated that the informant told him that he saw one "Boobie George" selling narcotics in the vicinity and that he had narcotics with him. Officer Jackson knew that "Boobie George" was the name used by defendant, George McCray, because he had had occasion to arrest the defendant previously. The informant then directed the police to the area where the defendant had been seen walking.

The other arresting officer, James Arnold, stated he had known the informant for five years and had talked to him about narcotics about fifty times. Arnold testified that from this information numerous arrests and convictions had been secured. Arnold also testified as to the information given by the informant and stated that he knew [fol. 39] Boobie George was the defendant, George McCray, because he had been acquainted with him and had seen him at least fifty times prior to the arrest.

The two officers then found the defendant walking around 48th and Calumet and arrested and searched him and found narcotics on his person. The defendant denied that he had sold narcotics and stated that he had been at a friend's house all night.

Defendant's counsel asked both officers the name of the informant and his present address, and the trial court sustained objections to all such questions. The trial court denied defendant's motion to suppress the evidence of the narcotics and the defendant was convicted of the charge of possession of narcotics.

The State contends that the search and seizure and the resulting conviction in this case are proper under our ruling in People v. Durr, 28 Ill.2d 308. The defendant, however, argues that the facts in the case at bar are distinguishable from Durr, or, in the alternative that the Durr case should be overruled.

The crux of the case is the question of the legality of the defendant's arrest, since it is clear that a search of the person without a warrant is proper, and the evidence found is admissible, if the search is incident to a lawful arrest. People v. Pitts, 26 Ill.2d 395; United States v. Rabinowitz, 339 U.S. 56, 94 L. ed. 653.

An arrest by a police officer without a warrant is lawful if the officer "has reasonable ground for believing that the person to be arrested has committed" a criminal offense. (People v. Durr, 28 Ill.2d 308.) In Durr we held that such reasonable ground may be supplied by information from an informant of established reliability, even though the State refuses to reveal the identity of the informant, provided that the informant neither participated in the crime or was present at the time of the arrest.

Defendant attempts to distinguish the Durr case on the ground that Durr did not contradict the truth of the statements made by the informant, but this defendant testified that he had just left a friend's house, thereby contradicting the informant's statement that he had seen him selling narcotics in the vicinity.

We do not think this difference in facts makes the rationale of Durr inapplicable to the case at bar. The criterion established in the Durr case was whether or not the reliability of the informant was so established as to [fol. 40] justify a reasonable basis for the police officers' belief that the person to be arrested had committed a crime. The subsequent denial of a sale by the defendant cannot affect the issue of whether or not the officers had a reasonable basis to believe he was committing a crime. We therefore consider People v. Durr applicable to the case at bar.

We have, however, because of the importance of the issues involved, carefully considered defendant's argument that our decision in Durr should be overruled.

It is well settled in this State that arresting officers may have reasonable grounds for believing a defendant was committing a crime based upon information supplied by an informant if the reliability of the informant has been previously established or independently corroborated. People v. McFadden, 32 Ill.2d 101; People v. La Bostrie, 14 Ill.2d 617; People v. Tillman, 1 Ill.2d 525; Draper v. United States, 358 U.S. 307, 3 L. ed. 2d 327.

However, we have also held that information obtained from a source unknown to the police officer is not sufficient in itself to establish such reasonable grounds for belief as to justify an arrest and incidental search without a warrant. People v. Pitts, 26 Ill.2d 395; People v. Parren, 24 Ill.2d 572.

We also feel that on a motion to suppress evidence, the State must show the basis of the arresting officers' belief, including facts relating to the credibility of the informant. (Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108, 12 L. ed. 2d 723, 729.) While the Aguilar case involved an application for a search warrant rather than an arrest without a warrant, the language of the majority opinion at 378 U.S. 108, 12 L. ed. 2d at 729, is pertinent: "Although an affidavit may be based on hearsay information and need not reflect the direct personal observations of the affiant, Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257, 4 L. ed. 2d 697, 80 S. Ct. 725, 78 A.L.R. 2d 233, the magistrate must be informed of some of the underlying circumstances from which the informant concluded that the narcotics were where he claimed they were, and some of the underlying circumstances from which the officer concluded that the informant, whose identity need not be disclosed, see Rugendorf v. United States, 376 U.S. 528, 11 L. ed. 2d 887, 84 S. Ct. 825, was 'credible' or his information 'reliable'." (Emphasis supplied.)

In the case at bar both arresting officers testified fully as to long knowledge of the informant, and his proven reliability based upon six or seven convictions resulting from [fol. 41] his information. Their testimony was even more complete than that contained in an affidavit for a search warrant approved in Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257, 267, 4 L. ed. 2d 697, 706. In addition, the informant's tip was in part corroborated by the fact that the officers found defendant in the same vicinity as reported to them by the informant. See People v. McFadden, 32 Ill.2d 101.

We therefore conclude that the evidence on the motion to suppress justified a determination that the officers had such a reasonable belief that defendant was committing a criminal offense as to justify the arrest without a warrant and the subsequent incidental search.

The only remaining issue is whether the State's reliance on the "informant's privilege," in refusing to reveal his identity, vitiates the otherwise lawful arrest.

In People v. Durr, 28 Ill.2d 308, we recognized the difference of opinion on this subject, and carefully examined the opposing policies involved. We concluded that justice would be better served by sustaining the privilege and upholding the arrest.

Defendant, however, insists that our decision in Durr makes the arresting officer the sole judge of the reliability of the informant, and therefore the final arbiter in determining the propriety of the arrest. We do not agree. In Durr, and more fully in the case at bar, the arresting officers testified to specific facts justifying their reliance on the informant. Here an arresting officer gave the names of specific persons convicted on the basis of information supplied by the same informant. It remained for the trial judge to determine the credibility of the witnesses and to decide if the facts proved justified the officers reliance on the informant.

We understand that defendant's cross-examination on this issue is limited by the nondisclosure of the informant, but we feel that this right of full cross-examination must give way in the face of a compelling policy to protect informants in the stealthy and vicious traffic in narcotics. The preliminary hearing, and the information given by the informant, did not go to the guilt or innocence of the accused. There is no suggestion that the informant was so involved in defendant's activity that fundamental fairness requires that his identify be revealed for the defense of the charge. (Cf. People v. Mack, 12 Ill.2d 151; Roviaro v. United States, 358 U.S. 53, 1 L. ed. 2d 639.) Nor is defendant denied the right to face his accuser in any constitutional sense, for nothing the information revealed [fol. 42] would be admissible upon the trial of the charge.

It appears implicit in the argument of defendant, and also in those opinions adopting a contrary view to Durr that an arresting police officer is less worthy of belief than an ordinary witness. We cannot subscribe to this belief. Trial courts must constantly determine the credibility of police officers in cases of alleged brutality, in cases where the arresting officer has seen a crime being committed, and on other matters of fact involving the legality of arrests or convictions. We refuse to accept the argument that the testimony of a police officer, under oath as to facts establishing the reliability of an informant, is incredible of belief. The trial court here was entitled to determine the credibility of these officers in their testimony that the informant here was proved reliable by six or seven narcotics convictions arising out of information obtained from him.

In addition to re-examining the policies underlying our decision in Durr, we have also considered the recent decisions of Federal courts urged upon us that were published subsequent to our decision in Durr. In Costello v. United States, (9th cir.) 298 F.2d 99, 101, the arrest was held invalid where the informant was uncorroborated and was unknown even to the police. In United States v. Robinson, (2d cir.) 325 F.2d 391, a conviction was reversed where the defendant was refused the name of the informant by the trial court. However, it also appears that the trial court apparently held that the narcotics agent was not subject to further examination on other crucial facts.

In Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S. 108, 12 L. ed. 2d 723, the Supreme Court clearly indicated in the case of a search warrant that the name of the informant need not be revealed if sufficient facts are shown to establish reliability.

We are well aware that there are decisions in other jurisdictions that cannot be reconciled with the view we take. Many of these decisions were referred to in the majority opinion in People v. Durr, 28 Ill.2d 308, 314, and in the dissenting opinion at 28 Ill.2d 319. Nevertheless, we believe that an accused is afforded constitutional protection against unreasonable search and seizure if the State is compelled to support a search incidental to an arrest without a warrant by credible evidence showing the basis for reasonable cause by the arresting officer. We do not believe that it is necessary to bare the identity of every informant assisting society in its struggle against the narcotic traffic in order to preserve the fundamental guarantees of the constitution. Otherwise the so-called informant's privilege and its value would disappear. We, therefore, adhere to our decision in People v. Durr, 28 Ill.2d 308, and the judgment of the circuit court of Cook County is affirmed.

Mr. JUSTICE SCHAEFER, concurring:

I concur under the compulsion of People v. Durr, 28 Ill.2d 308.

1. Whether "the right of the people to be secure in their persons . . . " has diminished to the point where an American citizen can be legally arrested on a public street solely upon uncorroborated purported information from an unnamed informer, and in the pre-dawn hours, in "extremely cold" weather be forced by the arresting officers to strip naked to his underwear so that a search of his person may be conducted, and then on the motion to suppress be denied the identity and/or production of the purported informer?
2. Whether the Sixth Amendment's guarantee that "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him . . . " is applicable to, and binding upon a State prosecution on the issue of the existence of probable cause to make an arrest, where the said arrest is based solely upon alleged unsworn hearsay allegations from an unnamed and unproduced informer, when those hearsay allegations are contradicted under oath by the accused and such contradiction is uncontroverted?

Argument

1. Where an arrest is purportedly predicated solely upon an alleged communication from a purported but unidentified "Reliable Informer", the arresting officer becomes the sole judge of the validity of his own arrest. No post-arrest judicial check is afforded and the accused, the trial court, the court of review, and, ultimately this Honorable Court are completely precluded from ever determining the actual existence of an informer; in short, whether, in fact, there was probable cause for the arrest.

   Only by requiring disclosure and giving the defendant an opportunity to present contrary evidence as to the truth of the officer's testimony and the reasonableness of his reliance on the supposed informer, can the courts make a fair determination of the issue 7

2. The Sixth Amendment guarantees an accused the rights of confrontation, cross-examination, and compelling witnesses in his behalf. These guarantees have already been held applicable to and binding upon the States. These rights are denied when the prosecution is allowed to cloak in secrecy a purported informer whose supposed communications are offered in any way against an accused 79

3. Irrespective of the quantum and reliability of the probable cause for the instant arrest, and irrespective of the confrontation aspect, discussed above, the conduct exhibited by the officers in effectuating the instant arrest sank far below minimum standards of decency and fairness, and thus violated petitioner's right to Due Process 87

IN THE SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

OCTOBER TERM, 1966

No. 159

GEORGE MCCRAY,

Petitioner,

vs.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS,

Respondent.

ON WRIT OF CERTIORARI TO THE SUPREME COURT OF ILLINOIS

Opinion Below

The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois was filed on May 10, 1965, and is not reported. A petition for rehearing was timely filed and said petition was denied on September 27, 1965. The aforesaid original opinion was modified upon the denial of said petition for rehearing. This opinion is reported in 33 Ill. 2d 66, 210 N. E. 2d 161.

Both opinions were attached as Exhibits (A and B) to the petition for certiorari.

Jurisdiction

The opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois as modified upon the denial of the petition for rehearing, was filed on September 27, 1965. The petition for certiorari was filed on December 20, 1965, and said petition was granted on May 23, 1966. The jurisdiction of this court rests upon Title 28 U. S. C., Section 1257(3).

Constitutional Provisions Involved

Fourth Amendment:

"The right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers and effects against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing a place to be searched and the persons or things to be seized."

Fifth Amendment:

"no person . . . shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law."

Sixth Amendment:

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to . . . be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor . . . "

Fourteenth Amendment:

" . . . Nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Questions Presented

Whether "the right of the people to be secure in their persons . . . " has diminished to the point where an American citizen can be legally arrested on a public street solely upon uncorroborated purported information from an unnamed informer, and in the pre-dawn hours, in "extremely cold" weather be forced by the arresting officers to strip naked to his underwear so that a search of his person may be conducted, and then on the motion to suppress be denied the identity and/or production of the purported informer?

Whether the Sixth Amendment's guarantee that "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him . . . " is applicable to, and binding upon a State prosecution on the issue of the existence of probable cause to make an arrest, where the said arrest is based solely upon alleged unsworn hearsay allegations from an unnamed and unproduced informer, when those hearsay allegations are contradicted under oath by the accused and such contradiction is uncontroverted?

Whether the arresting officers' conduct in effectuating the instant arrest violated the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment?

Statement of Facts

Petitioner was arrested by Chicago Police Officers Arnold and Jackson about 5:30 a.m., January 16, 1964, on a public street in the City of Chicago, Illinois (R. 6). Prior to being arrested, petitioner was walking through an alley (R. 6) and was committing no violation of any law (R. 11). The said officers had neither a search warrant nor an arrest warrant for the petitioner. Officers Arnold and Jackson stopped petitioner and placed him under arrest. The weather was "very cold" (R. 11) with snow on the ground (R. 7). The petitioner was not immediately taken to a police station, but instead was made to strip to his underwear. There is a dispute as to exactly where he took off his clothes; the petitioner testified that the officers "made me put off my clothes . . . outside the car" (R. 6), while Officer Arnold testified the stripping took place in the squad car (R. 17). A package of white powder, stipulated to be heroin, was seized from a cigarette package belonging to the petitioner, and this white powder was the subject of petitioner's pretrial motion to suppress (R. 3-5).

Petitioner further testified that prior to being arrested he was at a girl friend's house (R. 7).

Both Officers Jackson and Arnold testified that they arrested the petitioner after having had a conversation with a police informer, who had in the past supplied them with information which had proved to be accurate. They testified that this informer told them that the petitioner could be found in a certain named vicinity, and that he was selling narcotics and had narcotics on his person (R. 9 & R. 15). Objections to defense counsel's questions seeking to establish the name and address of the alleged informer were sustained by the Court (R. 12 & R. 18).

Officer Arnold testified that when he encountered the petitioner he, Arnold, told the petitioner that the petitioner had been pointed out as having narcotics on his person; that the petitioner said, "you know I am not silly enough to walk with violations on me on the street"; and that he, Arnold, then told the petitioner, "If you are clean you will have nothing to worry about" (R. 16).

Petitioner's motion to suppress was denied by the Court, the heroin was introduced into evidence against him, over his objection, on his trial, and petitioner was found guilty of the unlawful possession of narcotics. He was sentenced to the Illinois State Penitentiary for two (2) years to two (2) years and one (1) day.

Summary of Argument

Where a police officer arrests a person and seeks to justify that arrest solely upon a purported communication from an informer, the informer should be identified upon request. If he is not identified the officer himself becomes the sole judge of the validity of his own arrest. In such case, the courts are forever precluded from determining if there was an informer, if he had previously given reliable information, if he made the communication, and, if so, whether it constituted probable cause. In short, if the purported informer is not identified and/or produced there is no post-arrest judicial check on the arresting officer.

In addition, and no less important, the Confrontation Clause of the Sixth Amendment, already made applicable to the States, should now be held by this Court to apply to pretrial preliminary motions to suppress evidence. Inherent in this right of confrontation is the right of full cross-examination, and the Supreme Court of Illinois expressly concedes in this very cause that the petitioner's right to a full cross-examination was denied to him because of "the compelling policy to protect informers? . . . " (210 N. E. 2d 161, 164).

Lastly, this case well illustrates, in its particular factual setting, better than anything we can say, the inherent dangers present when police officers act unchecked and unrestrained by the judiciary.

The conduct of the officers in this case in stopping the petitioner, making him strip nearly naked in zero weather in the streets, telling him that if he had no contraband he had nothing to worry about, justifying their own arrest by what someone else had purportedly told them—this is conduct which shocks the conscience, conduct which violates even minimum standards of decency, and which certainly violates due process of law.

Where an Arrest Is Purportedly Predicated Solely Upon an Alleged Communication From a Purported But Unidentified "Reliable Informer", the Arresting Officer Becomes the Sole Judge of the Validity of His Own Arrest. No Post-Arrest Judicial Check Is Afforded and the Accused, the Trial Court, the Court of Review, and, Ultimately This Honorable Court Are Completely Precluded From Ever Determining the Actual Existence of an Informer; in Short, Whether, in Fact, There Was Probable Cause for the Arrest.

Only by Requiring Disclosure and Giving the Defendant an Opportunity to Present Contrary Evidence as to the Truth of the Officer's Testimony and the Reasonableness of His Reliance on the Supposed Informer, can the Courts Make a Fair Determination of the Issue.

The exact question—whether the prosecution may constitutionally refuse to disclose and identify one whose purported communications are supposedly relied upon to establish probable cause for an arrest—has never been decided by this Court.

The Fourth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States provides as follows:

> "The right of people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated, and no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by Oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized."

The Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution provides, in pertinent part, as follows:

> "No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property, without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws."

Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U. S. 643, 6 L. Ed. 2d 1081, 81 S. Ct. 1684 (1961) held that the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment rendered evidence obtained by a search and seizure in violation of the Fourth Amendment inadmissible in a state court as it is in a federal court.

> "We hold that all evidence obtained by searches and seizures in violation of the Constitution is, by that same authority, inadmissible in a state court.
> IV
> Since the Fourth Amendment's right of privacy has been declared enforceable against the States through the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth, it is enforceable against them by the same sanction of exclusion as is used against the Federal Government." (367 U. S. 655.)

Later, in Ker v. California, 374 U. S. 23, 10 L. Ed. 2d 762, 83 S. Ct. 1623 (1963) this Court re-affirmed the Mapp v. Ohio doctrine and held:

> "We reiterate that the reasonableness of a search is in the first instance a substantive determination to be made by the trial court from the facts and circumstances of the case and in the light of the 'fundamental criteria' laid down by the Fourth Amendment and in opinions of this Court applying that Amendment. Findings of reasonableness, of course, are respected only insofar as consistent with federal constitutional guarantees. As we have stated above and in other cases involving federal constitutional rights, findings of state courts are by no means insulated against examination here." (374 U. S. 23, 33.)

Thus, we start with the premise that this Court,

"has rejected the notion that the Fourteenth Amendment applies to the States only a 'watered-down subjective version of the individual guarantees of the Bill of Rights'" [Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U. S. 8, 10, 12 L. Ed. 2d 653, 84 S. Ct. 1489] and that the validity of the search and seizure in the instant case is governed by "the criteria [previously] established by this Court" (Ker v. California, supra, 374 U. S. 23, 24).

And yet, as stated above, there really is no decision by this Honorable Court governing the instant issue—i.e. whether an informer whose supposed communications are relied upon by the prosecution to establish probable cause for an arrest must be produced, or at least identified.

In only a single case has this court ever sustained the validity of a warrantless arrest predicated solely upon the word of an informer.

In Draper v. United States, 358 U. S. 307, 3 L. Ed. 2d 327, 79 S. Ct. 329 (1959) a federal narcotic agent, one Marsh, testified that he had been informed on September 7, 1956, by one Hereford, a "special employee" of the Denver Bureau of Narcotics, that James Draper (petitioner) was peddling narcotics to several addicts in Denver, and that he would return from Chicago to Denver with a quantity of heroin on September 8th or 9th, 1956. According to Marsh, Hereford also gave Marsh a detailed physical description of Draper and of the clothing he was wearing, that he would be carrying a "tan zipper bag" and that he habitually "walked real fast" (358 U. S. 377, 309). Marsh testified that he and another officer went to the Denver Union Station and kept watch over all incoming trains on September 8th, but did not see anyone fitting the description given by Hereford. However, on September 9, they saw a person having the exact physical attributes and wearing the precise clothing alight from a Chicago train and walk "fast" toward the exit. (Respectfully, the opinion does not make it clear how the informer knew on September 7 exactly what clothing petitioner would be wearing on September 9.) Hereford died four days after the arrest and "therefore did not testify at the hearing on the motion" to suppress (358 U. S. 307, 310).

Over the dissent of Mr. Justice Douglas, six members of this Court sustained the validity of Draper's arrest.

But Draper is not authority for the precise question involved in the instant prosecution because in Draper the informer was named and fully identified, although he died four days after the arrest. And this Court seems to imply that were Hereford alive he would have been made available and would have testified:

"Hereford died four days after the arrest and therefore did not testify at the hearing on the motion." [358 U. S. 307, 310, emphasis added.]

More important, it has not been made clear by this Court whether Draper v. United States, 358 U. S. 307, is still the governing law in the light of this Court's subsequent decision in Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U. S. 108, 12 L. Ed. 2d 723, 84 S. Ct. 1509, discussed below. That is to say, the Court in Draper was not "informed of some of the underlying circumstances from which the officer [Marsh] concluded that the informant [Hereford] . . . was 'credible' or his information reliable" (378 U. S. 108, 114).

In addition, in Draper "the evidence offered on the hearing on the motion to suppress was not substantially disputed" (358 U. S. 307, 309) as it was so disputed here. In the case at bar, the petitioner testified that the information allegedly given to the officer by the informer was false. That is, petitioner testified that he was at his girl friend's house prior to being arrested (R. 7), whereas the officers alleged that their informer said the petitioner was on the street selling narcotics (R. 9).

More recently, this Court examined the validity of a State arrest based upon the alleged communication from another informer.

In Beck v. Ohio, 379 U. S. 89, 13 L. Ed. 2d 142, 85 S. Ct. 223 (1964), the petitioner was arrested in his automobile, taken to the police station, searched, and clearinghouse slips seized from his sock. The arresting officer testified he had a picture of the petitioner and knew what he looked like; knew petitioner had a "record in connection with scheme of chance" (379 U. S. 89, 93), and that he had received information about the petitioner.

This Court held that the information in the possession of the arresting officers "at the moment of the arrest" would not "warrant a man of reasonable caution in the belief that an offense had been committed" (379 U. S. 89, 96).

This Court again made clear that an arrest, like a search, would be given greater constitutional preference if the decision to arrest (or to search) were made by a neutral and detached magistrate rather than the officer himself—i.e. if a warrant had first been obtained. The Court said:

> "An arrest without a warrant bypasses the safeguards provided by an objective predetermination of probable cause, and substitutes instead the far less reliable procedure of an after-the-event justification for the arrest or search, too likely to be subtly influenced by the familiar shortcomings of hindsight judgment. 'Whether or not the requirements of reliability and particularity of the information on which an officer may act are more stringent where an arrest warrant is absent, they surely cannot be less stringent than where an arrest warrant is obtained. Otherwise, a principal incentive now existing for the procurement of arrest warrants would be destroyed.' Wong Sun v. United States, 371 U. S. 471, 479-480, 83 S. Ct. 407, 413, 9 L. Ed. 2d 441. Yet even in cases where warrants were obtained, the Court has held that the Constitution demands a greater showing of probable cause than can be found in the present record. Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U. S. 108, 84 S. Ct. 1509, 12 L. Ed. 2d 723; Giordenello v. United States, 357 U. S. 480, 78 S. Ct. 1245, 2 L. Ed. 2d 1503; Nathanson v. United States, 290 U. S. 41, 54 S. Ct. 11, 78 L. Ed. 159" (379 U. S. 89, 96).

Accord: United States v. Ventresca, 380 U. S. 102, 13 L. Ed. 2d 684, 85 S. Ct. 741, where Mr. Justice Goldberg, speaking for seven members of this Honorable Court, sustained the validity of the search warrant.

> "In Jones v. United States, 362 U. S. 257, 270, 80 S. Ct. 725, 735, 4 L. Ed. 2d 697, this Court, strongly supporting the preference to be accorded searches under a warrant, indicated that in a doubtful or marginal case a search under a warrant may be sustainable where without one it would fail. In Johnson v. United States, 333 U. S. 10, 68 S. Ct. 367, 92 L. Ed. 436, and Chapman v. United States, 365 U. S. 610, 81 S. Ct. 776, 5 L. Ed. 2d 828, the Court, in condemning searches by officers who invaded premises without a warrant, plainly intimated that had the proper course of obtaining a warrant from a magistrate been followed and had the magistrate on the same evidence available to the police made a finding of probable cause, the search under the warrant would have been sustained.
> The fact that exceptions to the requirement that searches and seizures be undertaken only after obtaining a warrant are limited underscores the preference accorded police action taken under a warrant as against searches and seizures without one." (380 U. S. 102, 106.)

The officers in the instant case did not obtain an arrest warrant, nor did they have a search warrant (R. 11). No reason for not having applied for one was advanced (R. 11). This Court has held that the failure to obtain a search warrant will of itself nullify the search of a home though there be probable cause to justify the issuance of a search warrant.

"The point of the Fourth Amendment, which often is not grasped by zealous officers, is not that it denies law enforcement the support of the usual inferences which reasonable men draw from evidence. Its protection consists in requiring that those inferences be drawn by a neutral and detached magistrate instead of being judged by the officer engaged in the often competitive enterprise of ferreting out crime. Any assumption that evidence sufficient to support a magistrate's disinterested determination to issue a search warrant will justify the officers in making a search without a warrant would reduce the Amendment to a nullity and leave the people's homes secure only in the discretion of police officers." (Johnson v. United States, 333 U. S. 10, 13, 92 L. Ed. 2d 436, 440, 68 S. Ct. 367.)

And, this Court has made it clear that

"The language of the Fourth Amendment, that '. . . no Warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause . . .' of course applies to arrest as well as search warrants." [Giordenello v. United States, 357 U. S. 480, 485, 2 L. Ed. 2d 1503, 1509, 78 S. Ct. 1245, 1250.]

Thus it cannot be contended, legally, logically, or otherwise that the above quoted language from Johnson v. United States, 333 U. S. 10, 13, does not apply to arrests, as in the case at bar, without a warrant.

The decision in the case at bar clearly is in conflict with this Court's decision in Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U. S. 108, 12 L. Ed. 2d 723, 84 S. Ct. 1509.

In Aguilar, two Houston police officers obtained a search warrant to search the petitioner's home. In support of their application the officers submitted an affidavit which, in relevant part, recited that:

> "Affiants have received reliable information from a credible person and do believe that heroin, marijuana, barbiturates and other narcotics and narcotic paraphernalia are being kept at the above described premises for the purpose of sale and use contrary to the provisions of the law." (378 U. S. 108, 109.)

The search warrant issued. But this Court held that the warrant had been improvidently granted because the affidavit did not provide a sufficient basis for a finding of probable cause.

In striking down the warrant your Honors said:

> "Here the 'mere conclusion' that petitioner possessed narcotics was not even that of the affiant himself; it was that of an identified informant. The affidavit here not only 'contains no affirmative allegation that the affiant spoke with personal knowledge of the matters contained therein,' it does not even contain an 'affirmative allegation' that the affiant's unidentified source 'spoke with personal knowledge.' For all that appears, the source here merely suspected, believed or concluded that there were narcotics in petitioner's possession. The magistrate here certainly could not 'judge for himself the persuasiveness of the facts relied on . . . to show probable cause.' He necessarily accepted 'without question' the informant's 'suspicion,' 'belief' or 'mere conclusion.'" (378 U. S. 108, 113.)

This Court then concluded that:

> "Although an affidavit may be based on hearsay information and need not reflect the direct personal obser> vations of the affiant, * * * the magistrate must be informed of some of the underlying circumstances from which the officer concluded that the informant, whose identity need not be disclosed, * * * was 'credible' or his information 'reliable.' Otherwise, 'the inferences from the facts which lead to the complaint' will be drawn not 'by neutral and detached magistrate,' as the Constitution requires but instead, by a police officer 'engaged in the often competitive enterprise of ferreting out crime,' * * * or, in this case, by an unidentified informant." (378 U. S. 108, 114.)

If we assume in the case at bar that the officers spoke the truth when they testified that previous to arresting the petitioner they had had a conversation with a police informer; if we assume that this informer had previously given information which had proved accurate or "reliable"; and if we further assume that the informer told the arresting officers that he had just seen the petitioner selling narcotics on the street at 7:00 a.m. in below zero weather, there still was no probable cause under Aguilar.

In the case at bar, the arresting officers are in the position of the magistrate in Aguilar, and the informer's information must at least meet the requirements of an affidavit to a magistrate in order to show probable cause either for a search or for an arrest. We are still left with the "'mere conclusion' that the petitioner possessed narcotics [which] was not even that of the [arresting officer] himself; it was that of an unidentified informant." (378 U. S. 108, 113.)

Since, even assuming all of the above, we still don't know why or upon what basis the informer concluded that what he allegedly saw petitioner sell was in fact narcotics, the officers' testimony "not only 'contains no affirmative allegation that the [informer] spoke with personal knowledge of the matters . . . ;' it does not even contain an 'affirmative allegation' that the [officers'] unidentified source 'spoke with personal knowledge.' For all that appears, the source here merely suspected, believed or concluded that there were narcotics in the petitioner's possession." (378 U. S. 108, 113.)

Without the testimony of the purported but unidentified source, it can truly be said, in the language of Aguilar, that the arresting officers, the trial court, and the Supreme Court of Illinois

> "could not 'judge for [themselves] the persuasiveness of the facts relied on . . . to show probable cause.' [They] necessarily accepted 'without question' the informer's 'suspicion', 'belief' or 'mere conclusion'." (378 U. S. 108, 113.)

It is respectfully submitted that Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U. S. 108, leaves but one logical answer to the question posed—i.e. whether an accused is entitled to production of an informer on the issue of the existence of probable cause to make an arrest without a warrant. That answer should only be "yes." Only through the alleged informer's testimony can anyone (other than the arresting officers) determine the "persuasiveness of the facts relied on to show probable cause" (378 U. S. 108, 113). And such discretion, history teaches, should not be left in the hands of the police.

As stated, no warrant was obtained in case at bar, and the trial court sustained objections to the identification of the person who allegedly gave the police the information leading to the arrest of the petitioner (R. 12 & 18). While this Court has never completely answered the question as to whether the Constitution demands and requires that this so-called "informer privilege" give way when an officer acts without a warrant, and purportedly upon the informer's communication in making an arrest, this Court did approve some federal cases which hold that production and identification of the informer is required.

In Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, 1 L. Ed. 2d 639, 77 S. Ct. 623 (1957) the petitioner was indicted for having sold heroin to one "John Doe", a police informer. All defense efforts to obtain disclosure of the identity of "John Doe" were denied by the Court, and the petitioner was convicted. This Court first examined and restated the nature of the privilege, and then spoke approvingly of those federal cases requiring that the identity of the informer be produced where the legality of a search without a warrant is questioned. Speaking for the Court, Mr. Justice Burton stated:

> "What is usually referred to as the informer's privilege is in reality the Government's privilege to withhold from disclosure the identity of persons who furnish information of violations of law to officers charged with enforcement of that law. Scher v. United States, 305 U. S. 251, 254, 83 L. Ed. 151, 154, 59 S. Ct. 174; Re Quarles, 158 U. S. 532, 39 L. Ed. 1080, 15 S. Ct. 959; Vogel v. Gruaz, 110 U. S. 311, 316, 28 L. Ed. 158, 160, 4 S. Ct. 12. The purpose of the privilege is the furtherance and protection of the public interest in effective law enforcement. The privilege recognizes the obligation of citizens to communicate their knowledge of the commission of crimes to law-enforcement officials and, by preserving their anonymity, encourages them to perform that obligation.

The scope of the privilege is limited by its underlying purpose. Thus, where the disclosure of the contents of a communication will not tend to reveal the identity of an informer, the contents are not privileged. Likewise, once the identity of the informer has been disclosed to those who would have cause to resent the communication, the privilege is no longer applicable.

A further limitation on the applicability of the privilege arises from the fundamental requirements of fairness. Where the disclosure of an informer's identity, or of the contents of his communication, is relevant and helpful to the defense of an accused, or is essential to a fair determination of a cause, the privilege must give way. In these situations the trial court may require disclosure and, if the Government withholds the information, dismiss the action. Most of the federal cases involving this limitation on the scope of the informer's privilege have arisen where the legality of a search without a warrant is in issue and the communications of an informer are claimed to establish probable cause. In these cases the Government has been required to disclose the identity of the informant unless there was sufficient evidence apart from his confidential communication." (353 U. S. 53, 60.)

In the case at bar, it is entirely undisputed that there was absolutely no "evidence apart from [the informer's] communication." (R. 14 & 18.)

Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, was quoted extensively in both the majority and the dissenting opinions in Rugendorf v. United States, 376 U. S. 528, 11 L. Ed. 2d 887, 84 S. Ct. 825 (1964).

In Rugendorf, the defendant's home was searched pursuant to a search warrant. The warrant was based upon an affidavit signed and attested to by one Marlin Moore, a Special Agent of the F. B. I. In the affidavit, agent-affiant Moore swore, in substance, that on a stated date he had been told by a "confidential informant who had furnished reliable information in the past" (376 U. S. 528, 530), that during the previous week he, the informant, had seen in the basement of the home of Samuel Rugendorf (petitioner), certain furs; that the labels had been removed, and that the informant had been told that the furs were stolen.

Agent-affiant Moore further asserted in his affidavit that another F. B. I. agent, one McCormick, had told affiant that a "confidential informant whom the F. B. I. had found to be reliable" told McCormick certain things. Among these, were the following two incorrect and erroneous statements:

A) That Rugendorf Brothers Meat Market was managed by Samuel Rugendorf (petitioner), and

B) That Samuel Rugendorf was associated in the meat business with his brother Leo (alleged to be a fence for one Frank Schweihs, one of the alleged robbers of the furs).

Petitioner attacked the validity of the search warrant contending that there was no probable cause for its issuance. In so doing, petitioner demanded the name of the informer.

This Court held that the petitioner was not entitled to the name of the informer in his attack on the validity of the search warrant. In so holding this Court made the following pronouncement:

"The factual inaccuracies depended upon by petitioner to destroy probable cause—i.e., the allegations in the affidavit that petitioner was the manager of Rugendorf Brothers Meat Market and that he was associated with his brother Leo in the meat business—were of only peripheral relevancy to the showing of probable cause, and, not being within the personal knowledge of the affiant, did not go to the integrity of the affidavit." (376 U. S. 528, 532.)

* * * * *

"Petitioner also contends that the withholding of the identities of the informants was a sufficient ground to require suppression of the evidence. But in Jones, supra, we said that 'as hearsay alone does not render an affidavit insufficient, the Commissioner need not have required the informants * * * to be produced * * * so long as there was a substantial basis for crediting the hearsay' 362 U. S. at 272, 80 S. Ct. at 736, 4 L. Ed. 2d 697. Petitioner's only challenges to the veracity of the affidavit are the two inaccurate facts mentioned above. Since the erroneous statements that 'petitioner was the manager of Rugendorf Brothers Meat Market and was associated with Leo in the meat business were not those of the affiant,' they fail to show that the affiant was in bad faith or that he made any misrepresentations to the Commissioner in securing the warrant." (376 U. S. 528, 533.)

* * * * *

The case at bar is thus distinguishable from the Rugendorf decision. The most obvious distinction is, of course, that Rugendorf involved the validity of a search warrant thus bringing into the picture a "neutral and detached magistrate." In addition, in the case at bar, the arresting officers testified that the informer had told them that he, the informer, had just seen the defendant selling narcotics on the street. But the defendant testified that prior to being arrested he had been at his girl friend's house, located at a certain address. Thus the specific unsworn hearsay allegations of the purported informer were contradicted by the accused. That is to say, the factual inaccuracies of the unidentified informer were not of "peripheral relevancy" (that he allegedly had just seen the petitioner selling narcotics on the street). Furthermore, they purported to be within the personal knowledge of the informer, and thus they went to the integrity of the informer's purported communication. Rugendorf v. United States, 376 U. S. 528, is thus authority—in the factual situation of the case at bar—for the proposition that the informer should have been produced. The Illinois Supreme Court thus erred in holding that Rugendorf does not compel disclosure in the instant case, when that Court stated:

> "The subsequent denial of a sale by the defendant cannot affect the issue of whether or not the officers had a reasonable basis to believe he was committing a crime." [People v. McCray, 33 Ill. 2d 66, 210 N. E. 2d 161, 163.]

Long ago, as a matter of criminal procedure, under different circumstances, this Court indicated its approval of any fair method that would bring forth the truth. In

Graves v. United States, 150 U. S. 118, 37 L. Ed. 1021 (1893), this Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Brown, concluded:

> "The rule even in criminal cases is that if a party has it peculiarly within his power to produce witnesses whose testimony would elucidate the transaction, the fact that he does not do it creates the presumption that the testimony, if produced, would be unfavorable. I Starkle, Ev. 54; People v. Hovey, 92 N. Y. 554, 559; Mercer v. State, 17 Tex. App. 452, 467; Gordon v. People, 33 N. Y. 508." (150 U. S. 118, 121.)

Full and complete disclosure, not concealment and secrecy, should be the guideposts. History has taught us that the police cannot be trusted with such serious matters. "Judicial control over the evidence in a case cannot be abdicated to the caprice of executive officers." United States v. Reynolds, 345 U. S. 9, 97 L. Ed. 727, 734, 73 S. Ct. 528, 32 ALR 2d 382.

An analogous situation which immediately comes to mind is that involving the production of government witness reports. In such a situation, this Court has held, the Government has a choice: Disclose or Dismiss. Such was the ruling of this Court in Jencks v. United States, 353 U. S. 657, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1103, 77 S. Ct. 1007.

The rationale is simple: "The interest of the United States in a criminal prosecution . . . is not that it shall win a case, but that justice shall be done." Berger v. United States, 295 U. S. 78, 88, 79 L. Ed. 1314, 1321, 55 S. Ct. 629 [353 U. S. 657, 668].

No less should be the interest of a State in a State prosecution.

Jencks v. United States, 353 U. S. 657, involved the production, upon demand, of government reports containing statements of government witnesses relating to the events and activities to which these witnesses testified at the trial. Your Honors compelled such disclosure in the interest of justice. Among the authorities relied upon by the Court was the following quotation written by one of America's greatest jurists, the late Judge Learned Hand in United States v. Andolshek, 2d Cir., 142 F. 2d 503, 506:

> "'. . . While we must accept it as lawful for a department of the government to suppress documents, even when they will help determine controversies between third persons, we cannot agree that this should include their suppression in a criminal prosecution, founded upon those very dealings to which the documents relate, and whose criminality they will, or may, tend to exculpate. So far as they directly touch the criminal dealings, the prosecution necessarily ends any confidential character the documents may possess; it must be conducted in the open, and will lay bare their subject matter. The government must choose; either it must leave the transactions in the obscurity from which a trial will draw them, or it must expose them fully. Nor does it seem to us possible to draw any line between documents whose contents bear directly upon the criminal transactions, and those which may be only indirectly relevant. Not only would such a distinction be extremely difficult to apply in practice, but the same reasons which forbid suppression in one case forbid it in the other, though not, perhaps, quite so imperatively . . .'"

The Court in Jencks ruled that an accused was entitled to inspect the said reports:

> "We hold that the criminal action must be dismissed when the Government, on the ground of privilege, elects not to comply with an order to produce, for the accused's inspection and for admission in evidence, relevant statements or reports in its possession of government witnesses touching the subject matter of their testimony at the trial. Accord, Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, 60, 61, 1 L. Ed. 2d 639, 644, 645, 77 S. Ct. 623. The burden is the Government's, not to be shifted to the trial judge, to decide whether the public prejudice of allowing the crime to go unpunished is greater than that attendant upon the possible disclosure of state secrets and other confidential information in the Government's possession." [353 U. S. 657, 672.]

In the very last case decided during the 1966 Term of this Honorable Court, Dennis v. United States, —— U. S. ——, —— L. Ed. 2d ——, 85 S. Ct. 1840, this Court again emphasized this now-governing principle that there is a > ". . . growing realization that disclosure, rather than suppression, of relevant materials ordinarily promotes the proper administration of criminal justice. This realization is reflected in the enactment of the so-called Jencks Act 18 U. S. C. §3500, responding to this Court's decision in Jencks v. United States, 353 U. S. 657, 77 S. Ct. 1007, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1103, which makes available to the defense a trial witness' pretrial statements insofar as they relate to his trial testimony. It is also reflected in the expanding body of materials, judicial and otherwise, favoring disclosure in criminal cases analogous to the civil practice." [86 S. Ct. 1840, 1849.]

"... it is especially important that the defense, the judge and the jury should have the assurance that the doors that may lead to truth have been unlocked. In our adversary system for determining guilt or innocence, it is rarely justifiable for the prosecution to have exclusive access to a storehouse of relevant fact. Exceptions to this are justifiable only by the clearest and most compelling considerations."

• • • • •

"... In our adversary system, it is enough for judges to judge. The determination of what may be useful to the defense can properly and effectively be made only by an advocate." [86 S. Ct. 1851.]

But this is not all. Perhaps the most heinous aspect of the instant problem revolves around the probability—if not certainty—that for every arrest made, for every search and seizure conducted in which contraband is discovered, there are countless hundreds, if not thousands, in which nothing except innocent people are uncovered. It is only the guilty that are brought into the police station, "booked", and later brought to trial. It is submitted that no clearer example of this practice could be conjured up than the instant cause.

If the arrest here were not more than a mere sham or pretext to search, if the arrest was not in actuality predicated upon the findings of the search, why didn't the officers take the petitioner immediately to the station instead of stripping him naked in the street in order to determine whether the petitioner had any contraband on his person? If the officers really had legitimate probable cause for this arrest what did officer Arnold mean when he testified that he told the petitioner upon stopping him, "If you are clean you will have nothing to worry about"? (R. 16). Officer Arnold's own words belie his veracity. His own statement, quoted above, clearly demonstrates that this was an arrest based only upon suspicion—suspicion of the arresting officers and no one else. But,

> "Under our system suspicion is not enough for an officer to lay hands on a citizen. It is better, so the Fourth Amendment teaches, that the guilty sometimes go free than that citizens be subject to easy arrest." [Henry v. United States, 361 U. S. 98, 104, 4 L. Ed. 2d 134, 139, 80 S. Ct. 168.]

Such was what Professors Hogan and Snee of Georgetown University had in mind when they wrote in 47 Geo. L. J. 22:

> ". . . it must be borne in mind that any arrest based on suspicion alone is illegal. This indisputable rule of law has grave implications for a number of traditional police investigative practices. The round-up or dragnet arrest, the arrest on suspicion, for questioning, for investigation or on an open charge all are prohibited by law. It is undeniable that if those arrests were sanctioned by law, the police would be in a position to investigate a crime and to detect the real culprit much more easily, much more economically, and with much more dispatch. It is equally true, however, that society cannot confer such power on the police without ripping away much of the fabric of a way of life which seeks to give the maximum of liberty to the individual citizen. The finger of suspicion is a long one. In an individual case it may point to all of a certain race, age group or locale. Commonly it extends to any who have committed similar crimes in the past. Arrest on mere suspicion collides violently with the basic human right of liberty. It can be tolerated only in a society which is willing to concede to its government powers which history and experience teach are the inevitable accoutrements of tyranny." [Quoted from Mr. Justice Douglas' dissent in Draper v. United States, 358 U. S. 307, 321.]

If police officers are allowed to make arrests and then justify those same arrests by merely stating that they acted on a tip from some unidentified source, the officer himself becomes the sole judge of the validity of his own arrest. The Framers of the Fourth Amendment recognized this very danger when they determined that, absent some grave emergency, a magistrate should be interposed between the police officer and the citizen.

We must never forget, in the words of Mr. Justice Douglas, speaking for this Court in McDonald v. United States, 333 U. S. 541, 93 L. Ed. 153, 69 S. Ct. 191, that > "Power is a heady thing; and history shows that the police acting on their own cannot be trusted." [333 U. S. 451, 456.]

These requirements are, of course, for the protection of the innocent and guilty alike. The Fourth Amendment thus protects the countless thousands of detentions that occur in which no formal charges are made. Mr. Justice Jackson recognized these hazards in his dissenting opinion in Brinegar v. United States, 338 U. S. 160, 93 L. Ed. 1879, 69 S. Ct. 1302 wherein he wrote:

"Among deprivations of rights, none is so effective in cowing a population, crushing the spirit of the individual and putting terror in every heart. Uncontrolled search and seizure is one of the first and most effective weapons in the arsenal of every arbitrary government. And one need only briefly to have dwelt and worked among a people possessed of many admirable qualities but deprived of these rights to know that the human personality deteriorates and dignity and self-reliance disappear where homes, persons and possessions are subject at any hour to unheralded search and seizure by the police.

"But the right to be secure against searches and seizures is one of the most difficult to protect. Since the officers are themselves the chief invaders, there is no enforcement outside of court.

"Only occasional and more flagrant abuses come to the attention of the courts, and then only those where the search and seizure yields incriminating evidence and the defendant is at least sufficiently compromised to be indicted. If the officers raid a home, an office, or stop and search an automobile but find nothing incriminating, this invasion of the personal liberty of the innocent too often finds no practical redress. There may be, and I am convinced that there are, many unlawful searches of homes and automobiles of innocent people which turn up nothing incriminating, in which no arrest is made, about which courts do nothing, and about which we never hear.

"Courts can protect the innocent against such invasion only indirectly and through the medium of excluding evidence obtained against those who frequently are guilty.

"So a search against Brinegar's car must be regarded as a search of the car of Everyman.

"We must remember that the extent of any privilege of search and seizure without warrant which we sustain, the officers interpret and apply themselves and will push to the limit. We must remember, too, that freedom from unreasonable search differs from some of the other rights of the Constitution in that there is no way in which the innocent citizen can invoke advance protection. For example, any effective interference with freedom of the press, or free speech, or religion, usually requires a course of suppressions against which the citizen can and often does go to the court and obtain an injunction. Other rights, such as that to an impartial jury or the aid of counsel, are within the supervisory power of the courts themselves. Such a right as just compensation for the taking of private property may be vindicated after the act in terms of money.

"But an illegal search and seizure usually is a single incident, perpetrated by surprise, conducted in haste, kept purposely beyond the court's supervision and limited only by the judgment and moderation of officers whose own interests and records are often at stake in the search. There is no opportunity for injunction or appeal to disinterested intervention. The citizen's choice is quietly to submit to whatever the officers undertake or to resist at risk of arrest or immediate violence.

"And we must remember that the authority which we concede to conduct searches and seizures without warrant may be exercised by the most unfit and ruthless officers as well as by the fit and responsible, and resorted to in case of petty misdemeanors as well as in the case of the gravest felonies." [338 U. S. 160, 180.]

This prescript pronounced by Mr. Justice Jackson was recently again recognized in Miranda v. Arizona, —— U. S. ——, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694, 86 S. Ct. 1602, where Mr. Chief Justice Warren, speaking for five members of the Court, stated:

"A serious consequence of the present practice of the interrogation alleged to be beneficial for the innocent is that many arrests 'for investigation' subject large numbers of innocent persons to detention and interrogation. In one of the cases before us, No. 584, California v. Stewart, police held four persons, who were in the defendant's house at the time of arrest, in jail for five days until defendant confessed. At that time they were finally released. Police stated that there was 'no evidence to connect them with any crime.' Available statistics on the extent of this practice where it is condoned, indicate that these four are far from alone in being subjected to arrest, prolonged detention, and interrogation without the requisite probable cause." [86 S. Ct. 1602, 1632.]

In footnote No. 53 from the above quotation the following also appears on the same page (86 S. Ct. 1602, 1632):

"53. See, e.g., Report and Recommendations of the Commissioner's Committee on Police Arrests for Investigation (1962); American Civil Liberties Union, Secret Detention by the Chicago Police (1959). An extreme example of this practice occurred in the District of Columbia in 1958. Seeking three 'stocky' young Negroes who had robbed a restaurant, police rounded up 90 persons of that general description. Sixty-three were held overnight before being released for lack of evidence. A man not among the 90 arrested was ultimately charged with the crime. Washington Daily News, January 21, 1958, p. 5, col. 1; Hearings before a Subcommittee of the Senate Judiciary Committee on H.R. 11477, S. 2970, S. 3325, and S. 3355 (July 1958), pp. 40, 78."

In Jones v. United States, 266 F. 2d 924, 930 (quoted extensively, infra) Mr. Justice Bazelon also tells us about mass arrests without probable cause in the District of Columbia, and of the A. C. L. U. study in Chicago:

"For example, the victim of a recent robbery in the District of Columbia reported that it was perpetrated by three 'stocky' young negroes. Ninety persons answering that description were arrested—67 of them were detained in headquarters overnight. None of the 90 were ever charged with the crime.

"During an inquiry into the circumstances of this roundup, the Superintendent of Police stated that 'large-scale interrogations' were not unusual, and he cited specifically a recent investigation involving four murders during the course of which 6,170 persons were detained by the police. Washington Daily News, Jan. 21, 1958, p. 5, col. 1; Washington Post-Times Herald, March 3, 1958, p. B-1; Washington Evening Star, March 3, 1958, p. B-1. And see Trilling v. United States, 1958, 104 U. S. App. D. C. 159, 167, 260 F. 2d 677, 685 (concurring opinion). Junius L. Allison, Field Director of the National Legal Aid and Defender Association, recently wrote:

> 'Let's look at the figures reported by the FBI in the Uniform Crime Reports from the various states. In 1956 there were 111,274 individuals taken into custody on suspicion. These were not in connection with any specific crime. In the same year, 264,601 were apprehended where there was suspicion of guilt of particular crime. All of these—375,875, were later released without charge.' 42 J. Am. Jud. Soc. 113, 117 (1958).

And see 'The past is Prologue,' 38th Annual Report of the American Civil Liberties Union 84-85 (1958), discussing a private survey of Chicago police practices:

> 'The ACLU study, based on a sample 2,024 file cases selected at random from records of the Chicago Municipal Court in 1956, revealed that at least 20,000 persons were detained illegally 17 hours or more. Almost 2,000 of these defendants were held for two days or longer. And between 350 and 400 were held for at least three days "without charge, without bail having been set, without any vestige of

'due process of law' having been accorded them.'"'
[266 F. 2d 924, 930, footnote #21.]

In a recent weekly magazine article (TIME, July 8, 1966, page 65) a story illustrated vividly the principle that such matters as when to restrain a citizen's liberty of movement is too grave, too serious a business to be left in the hands of petty officers (and, we add, their alleged informants). According to the article, in Baltimore, in 1964, a police "squad spent 19 days in round-the-clock raids of more than 300 homes in Negro neighborhoods. They had arrest warrants—but they never once bothered to get search warrants. They acted in such classic disregard of the Fourth Amendment that a U. S. Appellate Court has just condemned them for the most flagrant invasions of privacy ever to come under the scrutiny of a federal court."

Judge Simon Sobeloff was quoted regarding this lawless police action as follows:

Again, this Court cannot say, the Supreme Court of Illinois could not say, and the trial court could not determine whether the officers had an informer at all; if so, whether he was "reliable"; if so, whether he gave the officer the information upon which they allegedly acted; and, if so, whether the informer (assuming there was one) was justified in so stating. The officers here made the sole and non-reviewable determination that there was probable cause.

Long ago, the poet John Gay authored a couplet about the lack of an opportunity to contradict a statement:

"When we risk no contradiction,
It prompts the tongue to deal in fiction."

Most respectfully, if your Honors affirm the instant conviction and allow arresting officers to withhold the identity of their supposed informers, your Honors will silently countenance those officers to "deal in fiction", thereby submerging the time-honored and tested requirements for probable cause. If this is done we can predict with absolute certainty that countless arrests will be made, and sustained, solely on the officer's word that "We received information from a reliable informer (R. 8 & 15) . . . he has furnished information to us many times in the past (R. 15) . . . and it was always accurate (R. 8 & 15) . . . the informer told us the defendant had committed and was committing a crime (R. 9 & 15) . . . the informer's tip was our sole reason for arresting the defendant (R. 14 & 18) . . . while the informer has given us this information many times in the past he has never appeared once in any court" (R. 15 & 18). Why has he never appeared? Because, "there never has been any need" (R. 18).

And, there will be no post-arrest check by the judiciary on any of this testimony. The courts will then become, in the words of Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U. S. 108, 111, "merely . . . a rubber stamp for the police."

Further than predicting the above "with absolute certainty" we cannot go because an informer's confidences are exclusively reserved for policemen. But we respectfully suggest that after attaining his present goal—the complete emasculation of the Fourth Amendment—the informer's next step is readily discernible by any student of government.

This Court has determined that disclosure of an informer's identity will be required if, in fact, it is > ". . . essential to the defense, as, for example, where this turns upon the officer's good faith." (Citations.) [Scher v. United States, 305 U. S. 251, 254, 83 L. Ed. 151, 154, 59 S. Ct. 174].

The validity of the arrest, and therefore the conviction, in the case at bar ". . . turns upon the officer's good faith". The informer, if he existed, should have been identified and produced. Identification here "turn[ed] upon the officer's good faith" as surely as it turned upon the F. B. I. Agent's "good faith" in United States v. Pearce, 7 Cir., 275 F. 2d 318, where the falsity of the agent's affidavit was exposed. In Pearce, the informer's identity was revealed and his relation, or lack of it, to the agent required a holding that the search warrant, valid on its face, was based upon an affidavit which was spurious and thus insufficient to establish probable cause.

Petitioner humbly begs your Honors to extricate from the hands of policemen the delicate function of determining probable cause, and revest it in the only depository which has ever proven itself worthy of its possession.

Federal Cases

As noted, Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, stated that most of the federal cases dealing with an arrest without benefit of a warrant have required production of an informer whose communication purportedly served as the basis of probable cause for an arrest.

If the Court please, let us now examine some of those federal cases.

In United States v. Blich, 45 F. 2d 627, two federal prohibition agents received information from a "reliable informer" that the defendant at a certain time would be making a delivery of intoxicating liquor at a certain designated place on the same evening. This information was received between 4 and 5 o'clock on the afternoon of the day when such transportation was to take place, about 35 miles from the designated spot. The time of the predicted transportation was stated to be between 7 and 8 o'clock. The officers proceeded to the place and discovered the defendant driving a Ford car and they stopped him. Inquiry was made as to whether whiskey was being transported, and upon such denial of transportation by the defendant the officers testified they discovered liquor by looking into the automobile and by detecting an odor of whiskey. The defendant was arrested.

With regard to the feature of the case involving the refusal of the officers to give the name of their informer, the court stated:

> "... The only question here is as to whether or not, when the matter is presented to a court for the purpose of seeking a determination of whether, under all the circumstances, there was probable cause, this element of those circumstances may remain undisclosed. It is scarcely an answer to the proposition that an agent testifies that his informant was a reliable person, and that he believed the information so given, unless the court sitting in judgment may have the right to determine whether, under all the circumstances, such information was reliable and the agent was justified in having such belief. A belief must or should rest upon a substantial basis. It is not a question of impugning the motives or doubting the honest belief of the agent in regard to the information which he may have received. It is simply requiring the witness to sustain his motives and his beliefs by all the evidence at his command. It is conceivable that a prohibition agent in the earnestness and eagerness of performing his duty might adopt very shadowy leads. But what is of greater consequence is that an ill-intentioned person might give an officer information which would in many instances lead to humiliation and vexation of the innocent automobile driver upon the public highway, and yet, with the failure to disclose the name of his informant, the prohibition agent would be safely ensconced behind his blanket testimony that he was informed by a reliable person." [45 F. 2d 627, 629.]

The Court of Appeals for the Third Circuit examined the problem in Wilson v. United States, 59 F. 2d 390. There the officer testified that he entered the premises of the defendant by means of a key furnished to him by a member of the Democratic League of Delaware. He was asked upon cross-examination, "who was the member", this question he refused to answer, and he was adjudged to be in contempt for his refusal. His refusal to answer was predicated upon the ground that the information had been confidentially given as an aid to crime detection. The Court held:

"It is the right and the duty of every citizen of the United States to communicate to the executive officers of the government charged with the duty of enforcing the law all the information which he has of the commission of an offense against the laws of the United States, and such information is privileged as a confidential communication which the courts will not compel or permit to be disclosed without the consent of the government. Such evidence is excluded, not for the protection of the witness, but because of the policy of the law. (Citations.)

"There is, however, an exception to this rule or a modification of this general doctrine, in that it gives way to another doctrine of the law when the two conflict. A trial court must dispose of the cause before it. If what is asked is useful evidence to vindicate the innocence of the accused or lessen the risk of false or is essential to the proper disposition of the case, disclosure will be compelled. (Citations.)

"The question here at issue was whether the evidence secured by a search and seizure should be suppressed. The proceeding was ancillary to a criminal prosecution against the Delaware league. The witness had testified that he had procured access to the rooms of the league on the invitation of a member, who had supplied him with a membership card; a key, and a plan of the building. If these means of access had not been supplied by a member, but had been unlawfully obtained, the evidence secured should be suppressed. Fraternal Order of Eagles v. United States (C. C. A.), 57 F. (2d) 93. To determine this, the information sought could not be withheld. The evidence was 'essential to the proper disposition of the case', and, in consequence, admissible, and, being admissible, the witness could not withhold it. Upon his refusal to testify he was properly adjudged to be in contempt, and an order of commitment properly followed." [59 F. 2d 390, 392.]

Mr. Justice Bazelon made the following analysis of the issue in Jones v. United States, 266 F. 2d 924:

> "The exigencies of law enforcement require that a police officer be permitted to make an arrest when he has probable cause to believe a person guilty of a felony. Ordinarily he must present what he knows to a magistrate on an application for a warrant, so that the decision whether or not to arrest may be made as judiciously as possible. But, when circumstances preclude this judicious procedure, the police officer may make his own determination of probable cause, subject to later judicial testing. This represents a compromise with principle, based on the assumption, not always correct, that when the objectivity of a magistrate cannot be brought to bear, a police officer sworn to uphold the law may be relied upon to act judiciously in abridging an individual's liberty. This compromise, which is dictated by necessity, transfers from the judicial officer to the police officer the delicate judicial function of determining in the first instance, whether there is probable cause. The dangers are plain. They would be increased beyond limits tolerable in a free society if the law allowed the police officer to arrest solely on the basis of an informer's uncorroborated assertions. For this would give the informer the delicate function which the law generally reserves for the judicial officer and allows the police officer to exercise only in limited situations. The considerations which justify delegation of the judicial function to police officers do not justify a further delegation to their informants.
> "It is notorious that the narcotics informer is often himself involved in the narcotics traffic and is often paid for his information in cash, narcotics, immunity from prosecution, or lenient punishment.

"The reliability of such persons is obviously suspect. The fact that their information may have produced convictions in the past does not justify taking their reports on faith. Like the roundly condemned ancient practice of approvement, the present informer practice amounts to condoning felonies on condition that the confessed or suspected felon brings about the conviction of others. Under such stimulation it is to be expected that the informer will not infrequently reach for shadowy leads, or even seek to incriminate the innocent. The practice of paying fees to the informer for the cases he makes may also be expected, from time to time, to induce him to lure non-users into the drug habit and then entrap them into law violations.

"For such reasons, the law has wisely circumscribed the use of informers' reports as a basis for making arrests. It has required a showing of reliability of the information and some corroboration by facts within the arresting officer's own knowledge. Such corroboration may be obtained by placing the suspect under surveillance and observing whether his behavior—e.g., making contact with persons known to be in the trade, or surreptitious passing of a package—tends to support the informer's story.

"How much personal knowledge the policeman must have before making the arrest cannot be determined for all cases. Since circumstances vary, the rule must be stated in terms of what is reasonably inferable from the particular circumstances by a prudent police officer.

* * * * *

"When deprivation of liberty by arrest is justified by a combination of an informer's report and a policeman's own observations, the less the policeman is required to observe, the more significant becomes the informer's report. Since observation of so commonplace an act as coming home by train is enough, in combination with the report of an informer, to justify an arrest, the only significant limitation of the informer's power to cause an arrest is the requirement of reliability. The requirement that the informer be reliable stands as the only effective legal safeguard against false denunciations by irresponsible individuals who may be motivated by self-interest, spite, or even paranoia. The only other safeguard which remains rests not on law but on the good will of the police officer.

"To give vitality to the requirement of reliability the law requires, if no probable cause exists without the information from the informer, that his identity be divulged, so that his reliability may be subjected to meaningful judicial scrutiny rather than accepted on a policeman's word. Roviaro v. United States, 1957, 353 U. S. 53, 77 S. Ct. 623, 1 L. Ed. 2d 639.

"It is easy to argue that the informer's reliability is established by the fact that the petitioner really did have narcotics in his pocket when he was arrested. But it is too well established for argument that the validity of an arrest cannot be proven by its fruits. A police officer may not make an arrest on the basis of information supplied by an informer unless he has reason to believe that on a post-arrest judicial test the informer's report can be shown to have been reliable when the officer acted on it. This is not a technical rule designed to shield the relatively few persons who are ultimately charged with crime; it is designed for the protection of the many whom the police arrest but do not charge. There is reason to believe that for every illegal arrest that produces evidence leading to prosecution, there are many which produce nothing, so that no charges are made and the arrests never come to light. The many innocent persons thus arrested have no effective recourse against anyone for the deprivation of their liberty. The law recognizes that the only way to protect the innocent is by imposing safeguards which protect the guilty as well. Weeks v. United States, 1914, 232 U. S. 383, 34 S. Ct. 341, 58 L. Ed. 652.

"Under the principle of Roviaro, the District Court could not properly determine that there was probable cause for petitioner's arrest without requiring disclosure of the identity of the informer whose report was claimed to constitute such cause. Nothing in Draper suggests that the Court has abandoned the Roviaro principle. Indeed the Court pointed out in Draper that the identity of the informer was disclosed. The treatment of the requirement of corroboration in Draper suggests that the Roviaro principle must be strictly enforced."

Recently (1961), in Cochran v. United States, 291 F. 2d 633, the Eighth Circuit examined the problem. In Cochran, the defendant was convicted of robbery. His conviction was partly based on the use in evidence against him of a gun seized at the place of arrest. Before the trial, the defense made a motion to suppress the gun as evidence. The testimony was that a Savings and Loan Association was held up on May 27, 1960; the defendant was arrested in an apartment on June 6, 1960. The apartment in which the arrest occurred was searched with no warrant of any kind, and a gun found in the apartment was subsequently introduced in evidence as the one used in the robbery. The officers testified that they were acting upon information supplied by a "confidential informer" to the effect that the defendant was "good for the hold-up". The informer allegedly also told them the approximate location of the defendant's residence, and that he had a car of the type they were looking for. This information was given to the detectives several days prior to the actual arrest. It was the government's contention that there was probable cause under Draper v. United States, 358 U. S. 307, and Jones v. United States, 362 U. S. 257. At the hearing on the motion to suppress, the District Court refused to allow the unnamed informer to be disclosed.

Judge Vogel, speaking for the Court of Appeals, compelled disclosure.

In 1962, the Ninth Circuit required disclosure in the case of Costello v. United States, 298 F. 2d 99. There the defendant was allegedly engaged in narcotic trafficking in Alaska. Two packages of marijuana were seized and introduced into evidence. The officer testified that they had received a tip from an informer, but refused to disclose the name of the alleged informer. To quote Judge Orr:

> "The so-called 'informer's privilege' invoked to prevent disclosure of the identity of an informant, has been established in recognition of the need by law enforcement officials for sources of citizen information which will remain available only with some assurance of freedom from coercion or retaliation by persons ultimately brought to justice as the result of a 'tip.' This 'privilege' is not absolute, however, and occasionally the price of invoking it will be the dismissal of a case because of the inadmissibility of evidence—the source of which is not subject to challenge due to the invocation of the 'privilege.' The 'privilege' must give way when a challenge of the informant is essential to the proper disposition of the case. The determination of the validity of an arrest, search and seizure is essential to such a determination. Wilson v. United States, 59 F. 2d 390, 392 (3d Cir. 1932). The Wilson case was cited approvingly by the United States Supreme Court in Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, 61, 77 S. Ct. 623, 628, 1 L. Ed. 2d 639 (1957).

"The customary check imposed upon arrest, search and seizure is the advance judicial check by the magistrate called upon to issue warrants. This check must occasionally yield to the necessity of quick action, in which case the magistrate's pre-arrest judgment is momentarily delegated to the enforcement officer who evaluates his basis for probable cause. The courts then exercise a post-arrest check on the actual existence of that probable cause. This latter check would not be effective if it looked no further than the uncorroborated tip of an anonymous informant. To stop the inquiry there, would be to delegate the usual advance judicial check not to the enforcement officer, but to the informant, and all with no ultimate judicial check whatever. This cannot be done. Whether the issuance of a warrant by a magistrate at the pre-arrest hearing in primary reliance upon a tip would be proper, we need not decide, for other inherent safeguards present at such a hearing are obviously not present in a situation such as the instant one. See Jones v. United States, 362 U. S. 257, 271, 80 S. Ct. 725, 4 L. Ed. 2d 697 (1960). It is enough to observe that in this situation, a reasonable opportunity for the appellant to challenge the reliability of the informant must be permitted on the motion to suppress, or no real judicial check would ever take place. The refusal of the trial court, upon appellant's request, to require disclosure of the name of the informant under these circumstances was error." [298 F. 2d 99, 101.]

Very recently, in United States v. Robinson, 325 F. 2d 391 (2 Cir., 1963) a case greatly relied upon by the instant petitioner in the Supreme Court of Illinois, a similar problem was presented. In that case, Federal Agent Giovino allegedly received a telephone call about 9:30 A. M. September 17, 1962, from a "special employee of the government" who informed him that the defendants would be arriving that day from New York with narcotics, but that he did not know how they would be travelling. Giovino then telephoned this information to Detective Gavin in Buffalo, who immediately relayed the information by telephone to Officer Clohessy of the Narcotic Squad, who was in a police car with Officer Quale. Gavin told Clohessy that the defendants were expected to return to Buffalo that morning with narcotics and directed the officer to apprehend the defendants near their home at a certain street. About 10:40 A.M. Clohessy and Quale saw Robinson and Daniels, the defendants, walking toward their home which was about three and one-half blocks away. They were carrying suitcases. Daniels knew Quale as an officer of the narcotics squad as he had been to her home a couple of times. Both Quale and Clohessy testified that they knew Daniels to be an addict. Quale also knew of Robinson's previous convictions for possession and sale of narcotics. When Quale asked what they were doing with the suitcases the defendants said they had come from New York, and had just gotten off the bus. Daniels was subsequently found to have narcotics in his possession and Robinson's suitcase contained narcotic paraphernalia.

At the hearing Giovino testified that he had received the confidential information, and that at some later time the "special employee" had been paid by the government. Defense counsel then asked the witness to state the special employee's name, the U. S. Attorney objected, and the court sustained the objection. The court held as follows (325 F. 2d 391 at 393):

> "Clearly it was error to cut off the examination at that point and refuse to the defense the only means of testing the fact of receipt of such information, the means of the informant's knowledge and the reasons why Giovino considered it to be reliable.
> "Without the information that Robinson and Daniels were coming back from New York with narcotics there would have been no probable cause for Quale and Clohessy to believe, when they saw Robinson and Daniels carrying suitcases toward their home, they were transporting narcotics. Thus it became central to the inquiry regarding probable cause that Giovino had in fact received some information prior to the arrests from someone who was in a position to know whereof he informed. The defendants were not required to take Giovino's word for this. They had the right to elicit all relevant facts so that the judge, rather than Giovino, could pass upon whether probable cause existed at the time of the arrests. To hold that the agent was not subject to further examination on the crucial facts regarding the informant would completely emasculate the requirement of probable cause where officers of the law act without a warrant. Such decisions should not be left in the hands of law enforcement officers who may later be called upon to justify their action; they may safely be left only in the hands of some impartial judge or magistrate.

"As there was not sufficient evidence apart from the special agent's information on September 17 to justify arrest, the identity of the informant must be disclosed.

* * * * *

"Draper v. United States, 358 U. S. 307, 79 S. Ct. 329, 3 L. Ed. 2d 327 (1959), is clearly distinguishable on its facts. There the Supreme Court upheld an arrest without a warrant under very similar circumstances. The 'special employee' had advised the narcotic agent that the defendant would be arriving by train and that he would be carrying narcotics. However, in Draper the identity of the informer was disclosed. It also appeared that he had given 'accurate and reliable' information on previous occasions. 358 U. S. at 313, 79 S. Ct. at 333.

* * * * *

"Usually the government is able to secure additional corroborating information so that the arrest may be supported by that other evidence, and in such cases, of course, the arrest should be sustained without requiring the disclosure of the informant. However, where it is essential to the proper determination of the validity of an arrest the government must either disclose or run the risk of having the arrest held invalid.

* * * * *

"Accordingly, we vacate the judgment of the district court and remand the case for further hearing on the motion to suppress, which hearing should be confined to the identity of the special agent and his reliability as it relates to the issue of probable cause."

The same Second Circuit Court relied upon United States v. Robinson, 325 U. S. 391, in United States v. Elgisser, 334 F. 2d 103 (1964). There, the defendant was convicted of knowingly possessing goods stolen from an interstate facility, and the question of reliability again came up. The court held that disclosure would not be required because the arresting agents at the time of the arrest had before them more than merely a tip that the truck to which they had been directed to keep a watch contained the stolen goods. But the court affirmed Robinson stating:

"Only information from a reliable informer will suffice to establish probable cause, see Draper v. United States, 358 U. S. 387, 79 S. Ct. 329, 3 L. Ed. 2d 327 (1959), and for this reason an accusation by an informer cannot itself furnish probable cause where arresting agents have 'no basis in experience for confidence in the reliability' of the informer's information. Wong Sun v.

United States, supra, 371 U. S. at 480, 83 S. Ct. 407, 413. Moreover, where information received from an informer is essential to the establishment of probable cause, his name may not be withheld from the judge or magistrate whose duty it is to determine whether the probable cause requirement had been met. United States v. Santiago, 327 F. 2d 573 (2 Cir. 1964); United States v. Robinson, 325 F. 2d 391 (2 Cir. 1963). As we said in the Robinson case, decisions as to the reliability of informers who have been furnished information used to make an arrest 'should not be left in the hands of law enforcement officers who may later be called upon to justify their action; they may safely be left only in the hands of some impartial judge or magistrate.' (325 F. 2d at 393.)

In this case the only evidence on the issue of the previous reliability of the informer was the opinion of FBI agents that the informer was reliable. Agent Martin, who, it appears from the record was the testifying agent who knew the most about the informant stated that he believed the informant to be reliable but admitted that he did not know who the informer was. It would seem that if the burden of establishing probable cause is in truth to be placed on the Government in these cases, and if the existence or absence of probable cause is in fact to be determined by an impartial judge or magistrate, then, where the existence of probable cause depends solely upon the reliability of an informer, the Government must be required to do more than establish that, in the opinion of the agents directing or participating in the arrest, the informer was reliable, or that in the agents' opinion information furnished by the informer in the past had been found to be reliable, whatever that may mean to them. The Government, in order to carry its burden of proof on the issue of probable cause, at least ought to be required to name the informer and to indicate what information the informer has furnished in the past, and with what results. Otherwise, the finding of the existence or absence of probable cause in a case where the reliability of the informer is at issue will not depend upon the considered judgment of an impartial judge or magistrate, but upon the judgment of law enforcement officers involved in the arrest.

Here, however, the arresting agents, at the time of arrest, had before them more than a tip that the truck on which they had been directed to keep a watch contained stolen goods."

One of the cases relied upon by Mr. Justice Schaefer in his dissent in People v. Durr, 28 Ill. 2d 308, 192 N. E. (2) 379, discussed below, was United States v. Keown, 19 F. Supp. 639. In that case, the defendants were indicted for the illicit possession of whiskey. They moved by timely motion to suppress the evidence on which the indictment had been obtained. A federal agent testified that the defendant was known to him as a "bootlegger" and had previously been arrested. The witness further testified that 2 or 3 days before the defendant was arrested a person with whom he was well acquainted, and who had theretofore given him similar information which he also found to be true, informed him that Keown would transport over a certain highway about April 21, 1937, moonshine liquor in a 1936 Ford, license #295-M-6.

On the date in question, while travelling along the highway, the detectives passed the car bearing that license. The officers testified that they pursued the car and saw some covered objects in the rear of the car. The car was heavily loaded, going at a rapid rate of speed, and the agents compelled the driver to stop, searched and found illegal liquor. The federal agent was asked by the defense counsel on cross-examination the name of his informer, he refused to answer, and the court ruled that he was not required to disclose the name of the person who had given him the information concerning the defendant's violation of the law. Relying upon U. S. v. Blich, 45 F. 2d 627 (supra), court reversed, holding:

> "In the case here under consideration, the officers making the search and arrest knew the reputation of one of the defendants arrested to be that of a dealer in illicit liquor, but did not know where the defendant would be or what kind of car he would be using on the day of the arrest, but for facts furnished him by the informer.
> If the information of the informer was unreliable or he was unworthy of belief the officer did not have probable cause to make either the search or the arrest. It follows that the court must have all the facts before it can properly determine whether the officer acted on reasonable grounds. If an officer should stop a peaceful, law-abiding citizen on the highway and search his car, subjecting him to humiliation and ridicule, and the offended citizen should seek redress by a suit for damages, surely no court would say the officer would be relieved of responsibility by an answer that he was informed by a reliable person that the citizen was engaged in the illicit liquor traffic, but he could not and would not disclose the name of his informer, thus preventing a fair and impartial investigation of his conduct. The certainty of the law is one of its greatest attributes. We cannot have one law applicable to an identical state of facts for the innocent and another for the guilty. The guilty may sometime escape under such a rule, but this need not follow if the officer be diligent, and likewise the secrets of state may be kept inviolate. The officer may use the facts furnished by the informer as a basis for his own investigation and discover sufficient facts to search or arrest without disclosing the source of his information." (19 F. Supp. 639, 645.)

"Every accused person has the right to cross-examine on material facts every witness who testifies against him. This has been the rule ever since the law became certain and stabilized, and is a part of due process, which found its expression in the Fifth and Sixth Amendments to the Constitution. See Hale's History of the Common Law, page 1145; Starkie on Evidence (2d Ed.) Vol. 1, page 160.

When the government calls a witness whose testimony is based in part on that of an informer, it subjects the witness to cross-examination and the informer to whatever peril may arise out of such cross-examination. It is a sound rule to keep secret information furnished to the state of violations of its laws, but this commendable public policy must yield to a higher, or at least an equal, right accorded to an accused to have a court investigate the facts material to his offense in a criminal prosecution, and sometimes the departments of government will be put to a choice of either foregoing a criminal prosecution or disclosing the source of material information necessary to the conduct of orderly judicial procedure.

The better way to reach the question is to compel the United States to forego the use of the testimony by the agent favorable to it, unless willing to submit to a full cross-examination." (19 F. Supp. 639, 646.)

Also relying upon U. S. v. Robinson, 325 F. 2d 391 quoted above, the U. S. District Court for the Southern District of New York, went one step further than mere name identification. In United States v. Goss, 237 F. Supp. 26, the defendant was charged with violations of federal narcotics laws. Agent Manley testified on the motion to suppress evidence that he received a telephone call about 2 P. M., April 22, 1964, from an informer who told him that Goss was going to meet someone about 5 P. M. at a certain address and was going to get some narcotics from the person to be met. The informer gave the name of Goss, plus a physical description, and a description of the clothes Goss was wearing that day. The agents drove to the stated address, and about 5 P. M. they saw a man answering the description of Goss walking down the street, saw him meet another man in middle of block, and saw the other man hand Goss a newspaper. Goss walked away and began to enter an automobile at which point he was arrested and in the newspaper heroin was discovered.

Upon questioning by defense counsel, Agent Manley testified, without objection by the government, that the name of the informer was Patrick Gonsalves; he also described Gonsalves and testified to his reliability. He further testified that at one time the informer had a house on a certain street. Agent Manley was asked if he could obtain the present address and telephone number of the informer, and he said that he could.

The court then ordered the information to be furnished to counsel for the defense, and there was an adjournment for the purpose of giving the government time to furnish the said information. When the hearing resumed 14 days later the government took the position that they had discharged their obligation by giving the name of the informer, and declined to give his address and phone number. Judge Wyatt held this insufficient [237 F. Supp. 26, 28].

> "This is an obvious case where 'disclosure of an informer's identity * * * is essential to a fair determination of a cause' and where accordingly 'the privilege must give way'. Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, 60-61, 77 S. Ct. 623, 628, 1 L. Ed. 2d 639 (1957).
> There is no question involved as to production of the informant nor as to requiring the government to go out and obtain information for defendant.
>
> The sole question is whether the government, in order to enable defendant to locate the informer, must give his present address and telephone number—information which the government is assumed, from the record, to have.
> There can be but one answer to this question and that answer is 'yes'.

The normal privilege of the government is to withhold the identity of an informer. Once this privilege has been found not to exist—as in the case at bar—the government must identify the informer, that is, give such identifying information as will reasonably enable defendant to find the informer so as to be able to interview him in preparation for trial, to call him as a witness at trial, or—as in the case at bar—through him to test whether there were 'reasonable grounds' for the arrest. Where the privilege does not exist, as here, there is no room for any argument for the government that it has an obligation 'to protect an informant from harassment and reprisals'.

The leading case, Roviaro, does not refer merely to naming the informer. The opinion speaks always of the 'identity' of the informer and makes it clear that this means more than the mere name. For example, in Roviaro there had been a motion by defendant before trial for a bill of particulars as to the 'name, address, and occupation' of the informer (353 U. S. at 55, 77 S. Ct. 623). The motion had been denied. The Supreme Court held this to be error. The Supreme Court said that 'when his name and address were thus requested, the Government should have been required to supply that information or suffer dismissal of that count' (353 U. S. at 65, footnote 15, 77 S. Ct. at 630).

It will be seldom that a name alone is sufficient to identify an informer."

California State Cases

The State of California has been confronted with the same problem—disclosure of an informer whose purported communications serve as a basis for an arrest—in a series of cases beginning with People v. Alanis, 309 P. 2d 71 (1957). In that case, the defendant was indicted for the unlawful possession of heroin. At the hearing, the arresting officer, Officer Smith, testified that on various stated dates before the arrest he received detailed information about the defendant from no less than four informers (referred to as informers A, B, C, and D); that their information had always been reliable; and that, in substance, they told the officer that the defendant possessed and dispensed narcotics at a certain address and in a certain car.

Smith testified that he went to the described house, saw the described car, saw a man who said he was Johnny, and arrested him. The house was searched and narcotics seized. The trial court refused to require the police officers to identify the informers. Holding this ruling to be error the District Court of Appeal affirmed. But Mr. Justice Vallee wrote such a well-reasoned dissent that it bears quoting in the instant brief, inasmuch as his dissent paved the way, as we shall see, to the overturning of this doctrine of nondisclosure by the Supreme Court of California in Priestly v. Superior Court, 330 P. 2d 39 (infra). Here is, in part, Mr. Justice Vallee's dissent:

> "The authorities are legion that it is for the court, not the witness, to determine whether the communications were made in official confidence and whether the public interest would suffer by disclosure. There was no evidence as to how the public interest would suffer—only the opinions of the officers. Testimony of a police officer that such a person is reliable is a pure conclusion of the officer. It is strange indeed that in practically all the cases reaching the reviewing courts in recent months involving the lawfulness of the arrest or of a search, the basis of the arrest or search was either wholly or in large part information received from anonymous informers. As counsel for defendant put it below, 'since the exclusionary rule came into effect there has been almost an identical pattern of testimony by police officers as to their reasons for making the arrest'. If it is the law that an arrest is lawful if made solely on information received from informers and that the names of the informers need not be disclosed, People v. Cahan, 44 Cal. 2d 434, 282 P. 2d 905, might just as well not have been written.

Defendant contends that by calling the officers and having them testify to information they claimed they had received from the informers, the prosecution waived any right to foreclose the defendant from ascertaining the names of the informers on cross-examination. The prevailing opinion does not discuss the point, nor was it considered in the cases cited in that opinion. The point is good. Where an officer testifies he obtained information from an informer and what the information was, he thereby waives any right to refuse to disclose the name of the informer. On disclosure the defendant has the right to subpoena the person named and ascertain his version of the facts (309 P. 2d 71, 83).

My position in this respect is that the prosecution, having called the officers to whom the communications are said to have been made and required them to state what the communications were, thereby waived the privilege and subjected the officers to cross-examination on the subject-matter of the communications, including the names of the persons by whom they were made. The prosecution could not require the officers to disclose as much of the matter as was helpful to it, and then shut the door as to any further inquiry by the defendant relating to the communications. Having required a partial disclosure, or rather one substantially covering the entire matter, it waived its privilege, and the defendant became entitled to a full disclosure.

The communications, to the extent they were given, were important evidence for the prosecution; in fact they were the only evidence bearing on the legality of the arrest, i.e., whether the officers had probable cause for making the arrest—a vital issue in the case. The evidence which the officers gave may or may not have been truthful; they may or may not have received the communications; and if they received them, they may not have been obtained from persons worthy of credit; if they were not received from persons worthy of credit, it could have been found that the officers acted without probable cause in making the arrest; and if the names of the characters said to have made the communications had been given and one or more of them had been called as a witness and denied making the communication, it might reasonably have been found the communications were not made, that probable cause for the arrest did not exist. In the only

California case which has come to my attention in which the alleged informer was identified by the officer, he (the alleged informer) was called by the defendant and testified he had not given the officer any information. People v. Lunbeck, 146 Cal. App. 2d 539, 303 P. 2d 1082. Certainly a defendant in a criminal action should not be precluded from rebutting the testimony of the officer and thus let the court determine the fact. As Wigmore, referring to the privilege, puts it, 'It is not to be both a sword and a shield', 8 Wigmore on Evidence, 3d ed., 830 ¶2388.

The privilege of a defendant in a criminal action to confrontation by the witnesses against him in the presence of the court is protected by the due process clause of the federal and state Constitutions. Snyder v. Com. of Massachusetts, 291 U. S. 97, 106, 54 S. Ct. 330, 78 L. Ed. 674, 678, 90 A. L. R. 575. The denial of the right of cross-examination is a denial of due process."

People v. Alaniz, 309 P. 2d 71, was decided in March, 1957, by the California District Court of Appeal, Second District. In December, 1957, the First District decided contrarily in Priestly v. Superior Court, 319 P. 2d 796. There, also, the police officer testified he received information that the defendants were in possession of narcotics but refused to disclose the source of his information.

The court, in holding this to be error, said:

"The question is not whether the facts told the police by the informer were true, but whether the police reasonably believed them to be true. The police attempted to meet that requirement by testifying that they believed the informer because as a result of past experience they had found the informer to be 'reliable'. In the instant case the past experience with the informer was extremely limited, but it can be accepted that it was sufficient to warrant the police in acting upon it. Thus, the police were told that a felony was being committed by defendant, and reasonably believed the information. This means that prima facie the police had probable cause to make the arrest and search without a warrant.

But upon proper request the police refused to divulge the name of this informant. How could the accused meet the prima facie case? The federal and state Constitutions guarantee him freedom from illegal searches and seizures. Since the Cahan case, illegally secured evidence cannot be introduced against him. The police were relying solely on the information secured from an informant to justify the arrest and search without a warrant. If the accused could prove that the informant did not exist, or, if he did exist, that he did not tell the police the facts that they claim were told to them, then the sole basis for the arrest and search would have disappeared, and the arrest and search would have been clearly illegal, and the evidence secured by such means would not have been admissible. But the accused was prevented from presenting such evidence. He was told by the court that public policy prevents the disclosure of the identity of the informant. Thus he was deprived of the right of confrontation and the right of cross-examination. He could not, in the nature of things, prove either that the informant did not in fact exist, or, if he existed, that he did not tell the officers what they claimed was told them. These are important rights. The public policy that supports the nondisclosure of the identity of the informer comes into direct conflict with the constitutional and lawful rights of the accused. Which shall prevail? That is the question." (319 P. 2d 796, 800.)

The Court answered its own rhetorical question, first by citing and quoting many authorities on the question and then narrowing and defining the issue as follows (319 P. 2d 796, 802):

"This brings us to the precise problem now before the court, namely, at the preliminary hearing, when it develops that the sole basis for the search without a warrant is information received from an informer, and there is no emergency, must the name of the informer, if known, upon request, be divulged or the evidence suppressed?

Logic, fair play, and fundamental principles of law suggest the answer. If the reasoning in the informant-participant cases is sound, and we submit that it is, then the same rule must apply to the problem under consideration. Every reason given to support the rule in the informer-participant cases applies with equal force to this situation. The rule of the Cahan case holds inadmissible evidence secured by an illegal search and seizure. At the preliminary hearing an officer can justify an arrest and search without a warrant only if he has reasonable grounds to believe a felony has been committed. When the sole basis for such belief is information secured from an informer claimed to be reliable, the identity of the claimed informer becomes of vital importance to the accused.

It might be that the informer, in fact, does not exist. Certainly, the accused is not bound by the officer's statement that he does. An officer who believes that the end justifies the means, and who does not agree with the Cahan case, could vindicate any arrest and search, however unlawful, if the identity of the informer need not be divulged. In that event the rule of the Cahan case would be subverted. As long as the possibility of a 'phantom' informant exists, it should and must be guarded against. Moreover, the informer may not have told the officer the facts the officer states were told him, or the officer may have had no real reason to believe that the informer was reliable. It is not beyond the realm of reasonable possibility that an officer, eager to carry out his duties, will follow up a lead that clearly would not constitute reasonable and probable grounds for searching without a warrant. After the arrest is made and incriminating evidence has been found, an over-zealous officer might well rationalize that society should be protected from the guilty criminal, and thus justify in his own mind the distortion of the actual facts told him by the informer. The possibility may be remote, but it exists. Certainly, the presumption that official duty has been performed does not prevent the impeachment of the officer. As was said in Powell v. Superior Court, 48 Cal. 2d 704, 707, 312 P. 2d 698, 699, in discussing a somewhat related problem: 'In the circumstances of the present case, to deny inspection of defendant's statements would likewise be to lose sight of the objective of ascertainment of the facts, and would be out of harmony with the policy of this state that the goal of criminal prosecutions is not to secure a conviction in every case by any expedient means, however odious, but rather, only through establishing the truth upon a public trial fair to defendant and the state alike.'

The defendant has a legal right to be confronted by his accuser, and to cross-examine him if desired. To deny him these rights, and thus to prevent him from introducing, if he desires, relevant testimony, is to deny him due process of law.

* * * * *

In the present case, the court, in refusing petitioner, upon proper request, the name of the informer, exceeded its jurisdiction. The court had jurisdiction to hold the accused to answer only if the legally admissible evidence showed probable cause that a crime had been committed. In the instant case, the narcotics seized in the search were not admissible unless the search was legal. To justify the search without a warrant it was indispensable for the police to prove that they had reasonable grounds to believe that a felony had been committed. When they relied solely on an informer (and there was no emergency), and then claimed a privilege against divulging the name of the informer, the evidence of the facts secured from the informer should have been stricken. If that had been done there would have been no evidence to justify the search. Without such evidence, the narcotics seized in the search could not have been properly admitted into evidence. Thus, if the accused's constitutional rights of due process had not been violated, there would have been no evidence at all of probable cause. Without such evidence the court exceeded its jurisdiction in holding him to answer. These are not novel principles.

The rule here announced should impose no unfair restraint on proper law enforcement. It is important to society, of course, that the narcotic trade be suppressed. But it is also important to society that all those accused of crime, including those accused of narcotic violations, be afforded a fair hearing and a fair trial. The Cahan case helps to assure the accused of such a hearing and such a trial. The rule of that case is sound. The courts should not permit it to be undermined by unsound exceptions. In our constitutional and democratic society it is most important that the constitutional and civil rights of all people, including the lawbreaker, should be protected. The doctrine that the end justifies the means should have no place in law enforcement, and should certainly not receive judicial approval. It cannot be true that the only way to enforce the law is to break it—that in order to catch the lawbreaker it is necessary to infringe his constitutional and civil rights. The use of informers plays an important and proper place in law enforcement. The privilege of withholding the identity of informers is also most important. But an abuse of the privilege by infringing on the rights of the accused should not be condoned. The rights of confrontation, of cross-examination, of preparing a defense, and of a fair trial generally, are too important to permit them to be frittered away by over-zealous law enforcement officials."

As noted, the Supreme Court of California redecided the issue in this case. In a typically well reasoned opinion by Mr. Justice Traynor, the court declared that disclosure or dismissal of the prosecution would be the rule.

It is worthy of note that Mr. Justice Schaefer of the Illinois Supreme Court, in his dissent in People v. Durr, 28 Ill. 2d 308, 192 N. E. 2d 379, 384 (infra), relied upon and quoted extensively from Mr. Justice Traynor's opinion in Priestly v. Superior Court, 50 Cal. 2d 812, 330 P. 2d 39 (1958). Here, in part, is Mr. Justice Traynor's opinion:

> "If testimony of communications from a confidential informer is necessary to establish the legality of a search, the defendant must be given a fair opportunity to rebut that testimony. He must therefore be permitted to ascertain the identity of the informer, since the legality of the officer's action depends upon the credibility of the information, not upon facts that he directly witnessed and upon which he could be cross-examined. If an officer were allowed to establish unimpeachably the lawfulness of a search merely by testifying that he received justifying information from a reliable person whose identity cannot be revealed, he would become the sole judge of what is probable cause to make the search. Such a holding would destroy the exclusionary rule. Only by requiring disclosure and giving the defendant an opportunity to present contrary or impeaching evidence as to the truth of the officer's testimony and the reasonableness of his reliance on the informer can the court make a fair determination of the issue. Such a requirement does not unreasonably discourage the free flow of information to law enforcement officers or otherwise impede law enforcement. Actually its effect is to compel independent investigations to verify information given by an informer or to uncover other facts that establish reasonable cause to make an arrest or search. Such a practice would ordinarily make it unnecessary to rely on the communications from the informer to establish reasonable cause. When the prosecution relies instead on communications from an informer to show reasonable cause and has itself elicited testimony as to those communications on direct examination, it is essential to a fair trial that the defendant have the right to cross-examine as to the source of those communications. If the prosecution refuses to disclose the identity of the informer, the court should not order disclosure, but on proper motion of the defendant should strike the testimony as to communications from the informer.

In sum when the prosecution seeks to show reasonable cause for a search by testimony as to communications from an informer, either the identity of the informer must be disclosed when the defendant seeks disclosure or such testimony must be struck on proper motion of the defendant." (330 P. 2d 39, 43.)

The same reasoning, in somewhat different language, was stated by Mr. Justice Dooling in People v. McShann, 321 P. 2d 533 (1958)

"It seems obvious that the same principles of fair play which require the disclosure of the identity of the informer when his testimony might be of material benefit to the defendant in defending the case against him on the merits should be equally applicable when the informer's testimony might be of material benefit in establishing that the officers did not have reasonable grounds to justify an arrest and search without a warrant. It is just as important to a defendant to have access to material witnesses who may satisfy the court that evidence against him should be excluded because it was obtained as a result of an illegal search and seizure as it is to have access to material witnesses who may give evidence which will result in overcoming in the eyes of the jury the prosecution's evidence against him on the merits of the charge."

Accord: People v. Robinson, 330 P. 2d 120, where at page 124 the court stressed the importance of the rule that judicial matters must be decided by, and kept within the confines of the judiciary:

"It must be borne in mind that the trial court and not the police officer must determine whether the latter's action is based upon probable cause, and when he testifies that he based the legality of an arrest on information given by a confidential informant, the court in deciding that probable cause existed for the arrest must find that the informant was reliable, the officer relied upon his information and the officer is telling the truth."

The above stated law was adhered to by the courts in People v. Chatman, 333 P. 2d 347 (Cal., 1959); People v. Gutierrez, 341 P. 2d 54 (Cal., 1959) and People v. Garrett, 47 Cal. Reptr. 194 (1965); Extended quotations therefrom would be merely repetitious.

As recently as May 26, 1966, in Martin v. Superior Court, 51 Cal. Reptr. 567, the California District Court of Appeal declared unconstitutional a statute which vested in a judge or magistrate discretion as to whether disclosure of the name of an informant would be required. The court reasoned that such discretion deprived a defendant of his constitutional right to due process of law, on the question of probable cause, and thus was unconstitutional.

New York State Cases

In People v. Malinski, 15 N. Y. 2d 86, 204 N. E. 2d 188, a trailer containing 1,298 cartons of drugs was stolen from a terminal in Boston, Massachusetts. Three days later the police, acting pursuant to a search warrant, seized the cartons from a warehouse. The judge who heard the motion to suppress determined that the search warrant was improperly executed, but ruled that the seizure could be upheld though made without a warrant, if the officers had probable cause to arrest the defendants. Thereupon, a hearing was conducted before another judge to determine whether there was probable cause to make the arrest. At the hearing, one Officer Sullivan testified that two days before the arrest he was told by an unnamed informant, whose tips, according to Sullivan, had "proved correct" on other occasions, that there was stolen goods in that building, and that Malinski and another were "involved". He further testified that after receiving such information the police returned to the building, and there saw the defendants and a large quantity of cartons. It was the defendant's position that Sullivan's informer was non-existent and that the police had actually acquired their information by use of a wiretap. The court refused to allow the defense to question Officer Sullivan about the informer.

The court, citing Draper v. U. S., 358 U. S. 307, 3 L. Ed. 2d 327, 79 S. Ct. 329, held that the requisite probable cause was present:

> "But this is not decisive of the question we are considering. The finding of probable cause necessarily rests upon acceptance of Sullivan's credibility; and the conclusion (from the present record) that there was probable cause does not resolve the defendants' claim that they were denied a fair hearing because, by withholding the informer's identity, the State deprived them of the only available method of rebutting Sullivan's testimony—testimony, so essential, the defendants' , that without it a finding that probable cause existed would not be justified." (204 N. E. 2d 188, 192.)

In People v. Yen Dong, 263 N. Y. S. 2d 102 (1965) the defendant was charged with possession of narcotics. At the hearing on the motion to suppress the arresting officer testified he had received a telephone call from a reliable confidential informant who had told him that a male Chinese, describing his clothing, was sitting in front of a certain address with two shopping bags, and pretending to sell vegetables, but was actually trafficking in narcotics. The officer testified he immediately went to the place, saw the said person so described, arrested him and seized heroin from his person. Relying upon People v. Malinski, 15 N. Y. 2d 86, 204 N. E. 2d 188 (supra), the court held that production of the informer would be required.

Sundry State Cases

In Smith v. State, 169 Tenn. 633, 90 S. W. 2d 523 (cited by Mr. Justice Schaefer in his dissent in People v. Durr, 28 Ill. 2d 308, 192 N. E. 2d 379, 384) the court held disclosure would be required.

> "So we think, when an officer seeks to justify an arrest upon a charge made upon reasonable cause, the officer should be required to reveal the identity of the person making the charge as well as the nature of the charge. The court has to pass upon the officer's justification, and that justification is open to impeachment. A defendant should not be bound by the officer's statement that a charge had been made, and unless the source of the charge was ascertained, neither its good faith nor reality could well be challenged. An unscrupulous officer, upon a fictitious story of 'a charge made', might vindicate any arrest, however unlawful, if there could be no further inquiry." (90 S. W. 2d 523, 524.)

Accord: State v. Edwards, —— Mo. ——, 317 S. W. 2d 441 (1958); State v. Cookson, —— Mo. ——, 361 S. W. 2d 683 (1962); Crosby v. State, 90 Ga. 63, 82 S. E. 2d 38 (1954); Drouin v. Maryland, 222 Md. 271, 160 A. 2d 85 (1960).

Mississippi, a State generally not otherwise noted for its liberality, requires disclosure of the identity of an informer whose purported communications are alleged by the arresting officer to be the basis of probable cause. See: Mapp v. State, —— Miss. ——, 114 So. 825 (1927); Hill v. State, —— Miss. ——, 118 So. 539 (1928); and Ford v. City of Jackson, —— Miss. ——, 121 So. 278 (1929).

Illinois Decisions

Now, if this Court please, attention at this point is invited to the holdings of the courts of review of the State of Illinois. A brief summary of these cases should illustrate how deeply the concept of nondisclosure has become entrenched in this State. It is a pseudo concept which, like a malignant growth, should be rooted out before it destroys the judicial organism.

Over the dissent of Mr. Justice Schaefer and two other justices, the Illinois Supreme Court first held that production of an informer, whose communications are supposedly relied upon by the arresting officer to establish probable cause, will not be compelled when the arresting officer testifies that he received information previously from the same informer, and the information proved "reliable". People v. Durr, 28 Ill. 2d 308, 192 N. E. 2d 379. Carrying that proposition one step further the Court next held that an arrest is valid even though "the record contains no affirmative testimony as to the past reliability of the informer". People v. Brooks, 32 Ill. 2d 81, 203 N. E. 2d 882, 884. In fact, the Illinois Supreme Court had recently held that purported communications from an unproduced "reliable informer" constitute probable cause for an arrest without a warrant even though his previous communication about the same defendant was not reliable. People v. Miller, 34 Ill. 2d 527, 216 N. E. 2d 793. It is not even necessary in Illinois for the informer to have communicated directly with the arresting officer, but he may pass his "information" on through intermediaries. People v. McFadden, 32 Ill. 2d 101, 203 N. E. 2d 888. The communications from these unproduced informers will not only justify arrests in public places, but may validly lead the warrantless officer to the confines of hotel rooms, and thus, presumably, private homes too. People v. Carlton, 58 Ill. Appl. 2d 163, 206 N. E. 2d 824, and People v. Varnadoe, 54 Ill. App. 2d 443, 203 N. E. 2d 781. Neither is production of the "reliable informer" required in Illinois where the purported hearsay communications to the police are denied under oath by the accused. People v. McCray, 33 Ill. 2d 66, 210 N. E. 2d 161 (the instant cause). Nor will the accused's request for an in camera hearing to determine the existence of the alleged informer be honored. People v. Nettles, 34 Ill. 2d 52, 213 N. E. 2d 536. Under Illinois law, the anonymity of these alleged privies to underworld secrets extends all the way from narcotics prosecutions (supra) to such other activities as prostitution, People v. Jarrett, 57 Ill. App. 2d 169, 206 N. E. 2d 835; gambling, People v. Williams, 27 Ill. 2d 542, 190 N. E. 2d 303, and the sale of firecrackers, People v. Brooks, 67 Ill. App. 2d 479, 214 N. E. 2d 498.

Not only is "Reliable" nondisclosable in his alleged communications with the police as he flutters about gathering tidbits of information (usually for pay), he is even allowed to maintain his secrecy, while perverting and prostituting a court document of such judicial sanctity as a search warrant, by signing a false and fictitious name to the affidavit for it. People v. Pugh, —— Ill. App. 2d ——, 217 N. E. 2d 557. And "Reliable" himself may surreptitiously furnish the actual contraband seized from the accused's home or person, and yet his identity will remain cloaked. People v. Connie, 34 Ill. 2d 353, 215 N. E. 2d 280, and People v. Freeman, 34 Ill. 2d 362, 215 N. E. 2d 206.

In the latter case, the arresting officer testified he received a telephone tip from a male "reliable informer" whom he had known for over a year and who had given him information leading to eight arrests. The Supreme Court of Illinois pooh-poohed the officer's previous testimony that the informer was a female, as merely "confusion" (215 N. E. 2d 206, 208).

And even in those few cases in Illinois where the informer has been required to testify in open Court he still may lurk in the shadows by giving a phony name, though his true name is sought in order to impeach him on prior inconsistent testimony given in another trial. Why? Because his true name might be of no use because the informer might have used a phony name in the other trial too! People v. Smith, —— Ill. App. 2d ——, 217 N. E. 2d 546.

The Courts have yet to spell out what they require within the framework of "reliability". Must the information previously given have related to crimes, or is it sufficient if "Reliable" was previously correct on the weather, travel directions, baseball scores, etc.? We are not told. But we are told that the information was always "reliable"—i.e. the police believed it.

If a myriad of warrantless searches are conducted which produce no "fruits", there is no record of it because the police only charge persons "caught with the goods", and police informers are always "reliable". If, by signing a fictitious name to an affidavit, or by filtering his "information" through a police officer, thousands of homes are searched in which nothing is recovered, there is no record of this either because the Illinois statutes provide that: "The Complaint on which the warrant is issued need not be filed . . . with the Court . . . until the warrant has been executed . . . " Ill. Rev. Stats., 1963, Chap. 38, Section 108-4. And, of course, warrants are rarely, if ever, filed when nothing is found.

A beacon of fading hope, but brilliant logic, continues to shine forth: Mr. Justice Schaefer's dissenting opinion in People v. Durr, 28 Ill. 2d 308, 192 N. E. 2d 379, 382:

> "But even if the testimony of the policeman, standing alone, might have supported a finding that the informer was reliable, it was deprived of probative force by the fact that the defendant, on cross-examination of Officer Webster, twice asked and was twice denied the name and identity of the informer. The defendant's right to test the reasonableness of the officer's conduct, and to impeach his testimony as to the reliability of the informer, was thereby frustrated.
>
>
> Here the defendant's conviction stands or falls on the determination whether there was reasonable ground for his arrest. That determination turns upon the existence and the reliability of the informer. There was no independent corroboration, and without knowledge of the identity of the informer the defense can not effectively contest the policeman's opinion as to his reliability. Rational appraisal by the court is foreclosed, and the policeman himself conclusively determines the validity of his own arrest.
>
> • • • • • •
> The answer to what the opinion of the court characterizes as the basic question here,—'whether the right of the individual to protection against the harassment of unreasonable searches and false arrests is superior to the necessity of protecting the public against the evils of organized crime,'—was given long ago. It is clearly stated in the provisions of the constitutions of the United States and of this State which prohibit unreasonable search and seizure. Those provisions charge the courts with the responsibility of enforcing limitations upon arrest and upon the introduction of illegally seized evidence. The courts can not discharge that responsibility unless they can look behind the policeman's assertion. I would therefore reverse the judgment and remand the cause for a new trial, in accordance with the weight of persuasive authority. Scher v. United States, 305 U. S. 251, 59 S. Ct. 174, 83 L. Ed. 151; Wilson v. United States (3rd cir.), 59 F. 2d 390 (1932); United States v. Blich, 45 F. 2d 627 (D. C. Wyo. 1930); United States v. Keown, 19 F. Supp. 639 (W. D. Ky. 1937); Smith v. State, 169 Tenn. 633, 90 S. W. 2d 523." (192 N. E. 2d 379, 383-4.)

In addition, Justice Schaefer in his dissent quoted from two authorities previously cited and quoted above: Mr. Justice Traynor's opinion in Priestly v. Superior Court, 50 Cal. 2d 812, 330 P. 2d 39, and Judge Bazelon's statement in Jones v. United States, 266 F. 2d 924.

In the case at bar, Justice Schaefer concurred "under the compulsion of People v. Durr, 28 Ill. 2d 308, 192 N. E. 2d 379."

Respectfully, and with the utmost of caution, we are constrained to believe that the Illinois Supreme Court, and the courts of some of the other jurisdictions, have taken the easy way out. It is far easier to uphold the validity of an arrest based upon a policeman's word and let it go at that. No one can contest the officer's testimony that he had an informer, and that he said what the officer says he said, simply because the accused is unable to prove otherwise. Therefore, there must have been an informer, and he must have told the officers what they say he did, and anyway, what real difference does it make because he is " . . . an informer and nothing more." Miller v. United States, 273 F. 2d 279, 281. He has nothing to contribute " . . . to a fair determination of the cause." United States v. Whiting, 311 F. 2d 191, 195. He did not help "to set up the crime and was [not] present at its occurrence." Jones v. United States, 271 F. 2d 494, 496. His name is not "necessary or desirable to show the prisoner's innocence." United States v. Li Fat Tong, 152 F. 2d 650, 652.

Dissenting in United States v. St. Pierre, 132 F. 2d 837, at p. 848, the late Mr. Justice Jerome Frank succinctly stated his belief in the "fullest practical disclosure" in another connection:

> "Since I thing that the fullest practicable disclosure to the courts of all important evidence bearing on the facts of cases is essential to the administration of justice, I agree heartily with critics of all privileges accorded witnesses that each of those privileges needs periodic examination to determine whether the policy which prompted it is sufficient to outweigh its interference with access to such evidence. Indeed, I take far more seriously than do many of those critics the idea that, if courts of justice are to do justice, it is imperative that the courts come closer than they do today to the actual facts, and exercise more care in the art of fact-finding."

And this, if this Court please, is exactly our point. This Court should at long last examine the entire so-called "informer's privilege" and make a fresh determination, using Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53 as a foundation, ever keeping in mind that:

> "A democratic society, in which respect for the dignity of all men is central, naturally guards against the misuse of the law enforcement process. Zeal in tracking down crime is not in itself an assurance of soberness of judgment. Disinterestedness in law enforcement does not alone prevent disregard of cherished liberties. Experience has therefore counseled that safeguards must be provided against the dangers of the overzealous as well as the despotic. The lawful instruments of the criminal law cannot be entrusted to a single functionary. The complicated process of criminal justice is therefore divided into different parts, responsibility for which is separately vested in the various participants upon whom the criminal law relies for its vindication." [McNabb v. United States, 318 U. S. 332, 343, 87 L. Ed. 819, 825, 63 S. Ct. 608.]

Your Honors must surely be aware that the holding in Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, has generated a flurry of inventive activity in a search for mechanistic slogans designed to circumvent the effect of that decision. Against that pernicious search, we pray that this Court resolutely set its face.

The Sixth Amendment Guarantees an Accused the Rights of Confrontation, Cross-Examination, and Compelling Witnesses in His Behalf. These Guarantees Have Already Been Held Applicable to and Binding Upon the States. These Rights Are Denied When the Prosecution Is Allowed to Cloak in Secrecy a Purported Informer Whose Supposed Communications Are Offered in Any Way Against an Accused.

The Sixth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States of America provides, in part, as follows:

> "In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right . . . to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense."

Under other factual circumstances this Court has held that the Sixth Amendment Confrontation Clause applies, through the Fourteenth Amendment, to the States in a State prosecution:

> "We hold today that the Sixth Amendment's right of an accused to confront the witnesses against him is likewise a fundamental right and is made obligatory on the States by the Fourteenth Amendment." [Pointer v. Texas, 380 U. S. 400, 403, 13 L. Ed. 2d 923, 85 S. Ct. 1065.]

But this Court did not stop there; it went on in the next paragraph to hold the obvious—that the right of confrontation includes the right of cross-examination:

"It cannot seriously be doubted at this late date that the right of cross-examination is included in the right of an accused in a criminal case to confront the witnesses against him. And probably no one, certainly no one experienced in the trial of lawsuits, would deny the value of cross-examination in exposing falsehood and bringing out the truth in the trial of a criminal case. See e.g. 5 Wigmore, Evidence ¶1367 (3d ed. 1940). The fact that this right appears in the Sixth Amendment of our Bill of Rights reflects the belief of the Framers of those liberties and safeguards that confrontation was a fundamental right essential to a fair trial in a criminal prosecution. Moreover, the decisions of this Court and other courts throughout the years have constantly emphasized the necessity for cross-examination as protection for defendants in criminal cases. This Court in Kirby v. United States, 174 U. S. 47, 55, 56, 19 S. Ct. 574, 577, 43 L. Ed. 890, referred to the right of confrontation as [o]ne of the fundamental guaranties of life and liberty, and a right long deemed so essential for the due protection of life and liberty that it is guarded against legislative and judicial action by provisions in the Constitution of the United States and in the constitutions of most, if not of all, the states composing the Union. Mr. Justice Stone, writing for the Court in Alford v. United States, 282 U. S. 687, 692, 51 S. Ct. 218, 219, 75 L. Ed. 624, declared that the right of cross-examination is one of the safeguards essential to a fair trial. And in speaking of confrontation and cross-examination this Court said in Greene v. McElroy, 360 U. S. 474, 79 S. Ct. 1400, 3 L. Ed. 2d 1377:

'They have ancient roots. They find expression in the Sixth Amendment which provides that in all criminal cases the accused shall enjoy the right "to be confronted with the witnesses against him." This Court has been zealous to protect these rights from erosion. 360 U. S. at 496-497, 79 S. Ct. at 1413 (footnote omitted).'

"There are few subjects, perhaps, upon which this Court and other courts have been more nearly unanimous than in their expressions of belief that the right of confrontation and cross-examination is an essential and fundamental requirement for the kind of fair trial which is this country's constitutional goal. Indeed, we have expressly declared that to deprive an accused of the right to cross-examine the witness against him is a denial of the Fourteenth Amendment's guarantee of due process of law. In In re Oliver, 333 U. S. 257, 68 S. Ct. 499, 92 L. Ed. 682, this Court said:

'A person's right to reasonable notice of a charge against him, and an opportunity to be heard in his defense—a right to his day in court—are basic in our system of jurisprudence: and these rights include, as a minimum, a right to examine the witnesses against him, to offer testimony, and to be represented by counsel. 333 U. S. at 273, 68 S. Ct. at 507 (footnote omitted).'

"And earlier this Term in Turner v. State of Louisiana, 379 U. S. 466, 472, 473, 85 S. Ct. 546, 550, 13 L. Ed. 2d 424, we held:

'In the constitutional sense, trial by jury in a criminal case necessarily implies at the very least that the evidence developed against a defendant shall come from the witness stand in a public courtroom where there is full judicial protection of the defendant's right of confrontation, of cross-examination, and of counsel.'" (380 U. S. 400, 404.)

Accord, Douglas v. Alabama, 380 U. S. 415, 13 L. Ed. 2d 934, 85 S. Ct. 1074, decided the same day as Pointer v. Texas, 380 U. S. 400 (supra).

As noted, one of the cases relied upon by Mr. Justice Black, speaking for the Court in Pointer v. Texas, 380 U. S. 400, was Alford v. United States, 282 U. S. 687, 75 L. Ed. 624, 51 S. Ct. 218. Mr. Justice Stone in Alford developed, in simple language, the absolute fundamental necessity of full cross-examination:

"Cross-examination of a witness is a matter of right . . . Its permissible purposes, among others, are that the witness may be identified with his community so that independent testimony may be sought and offered of his reputation for veracity in his own neighborhood . . . that the jury may interpret his testimony in the light reflected upon it by knowledge of his environment . . . and that facts may be brought out tending to discredit the witness by showing that his testimony in chief was untrue or biased . . . Counsel often cannot know in advance what pertinent facts may be elicited on cross-examination. For that reason it is necessarily exploratory; and the rule that the examiner must indicate the purpose of his inquiry does not, in general, apply . . . It is the essence of a fair trial that reasonable latitude be given the cross-examiner, even though he is unable to state to the court what facts a reasonable cross-examination might develop. Prejudice ensues from a denial of the opportunity to > place the witness in his proper setting and put the weight of his testimony and his credibility to a test, without which the jury cannot fairly appraise them . . . To say that prejudice can be established only by showing that the cross-examination, if pursued, would necessarily have brought out facts tending to discredit the testimony in chief, is to deny a substantial right and withdraw one of the safeguards essential to a fair trial . . . In this respect a summary denial of the right of cross-examination is distinguished from the erroneous admission of harmless testimony." (282 U. S. 687, 691.)

The California courts have recognized the importance of full confrontation and cross-examination in informer cases.

In People v. Kiihoa, 3 Cal. Rptr. 1, the prosecution withheld prosecution of the defendant until the informer was out of the jurisdiction. The court held this to be a violation of due process. But the court also held it violated the defendant's inalienable right to confront the witnesses against him:

> "The right of an accused to be confronted with the witnesses is the—right to have—witnesses who testify do so in the presence of and subject to cross-examination by the defendant. The prosecution is not required to call any particular witness, nor to put on all the evidence relating to a charge so long as all material evidence bearing thereon is fairly presented in such a manner as to accord to the defendant a fair trial." [3 Cal. Rptr. 1, 3.]

Accord: Crosby v. State, 90 Ga. 63, 82 S. E. 2d 38.

Contrast the language in the above holding with the following words of Mr. Justice Solfisburg in the instant cause:

> "We understand the defendant's cross-examination on this issue is limited by the nondisclosure of the informant, but we feel that this right of full cross-examination must give way in the face of a compelling policy to protect informants in the stealthy and vicious traffic in narcotics. The preliminary hearing, and the information given by the informant, did not go to the guilt or innocence of the accused. There is no suggestion that the informant was so involved in defendant's activity that fundamental fairness requires that his identity be revealed for the defense of the charge (Cf. People v. Mack, 12 Ill. 2d 151, 145 N. E. 2d 609, Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, 77 S. Ct. 623, 1 L. Ed. 2d 639). Nor is defendant denied the right to face his accuser in any constitutional sense, for nothing the information revealed would be admissible on the trial." [210 N. E. 2d 161, 164.]

Most respectfully, nothing is said in the Sixth Amendment about protecting informers by limiting the accused's guarantee of confrontation and cross-examination.

Mr. Justice Solfisburg's statement—that the defendant has not been "denied the right to face his accuser in any constitutional sense"—has been answered by Mr. Justice Traynor in Priestly v. Superior Court, 330 P. 2d 39:

> "The People contend that even if disclosure is required at the trial, it should not be required at the preliminary hearing. Since the purpose of the preliminary hearing, however, is to determine whether there is competent evidence to commit the defendant for trial, disclosure at that time is necessary to determine whether the evidence acquired by the search is competent. The defendant may not be committed for trial when there is no competent evidence to support a belief that he is guilty of a public offense. Moreover, disclosure at the preliminary hearing will ordinarily obviate the necessity of a continuance during the trial to permit the defendant to locate and interview the informer. Defendant was therefore entitled either to disclosure of the informers' identities or to the striking on proper motion of the testimony of the officer as to the communications of the informer offered to establish the legality of the search." (330 P. 2d 39, 43.)

Neither is anything said in the Sixth Amendment to the effect that the right of Confrontation only applies to a trial on the merits.

Quite the opposite. The very same Sixth Amendment that contains the guarantee of Confrontation also promises the accused the right to have the "Assistance of Counsel for his defense." Has this court limited this latter clause to the actual trial on the merits? To the contrary, the Court has held that an accused " . . . requires the guiding hand of counsel at every step in the proceedings against him." Powell v. Alabama, 287 U. S. 45, 69, 77 L. Ed. 158, 170, 53 S. Ct. 55, 84 A. L. R. 527. [Emphasis added.]

This Court has held that the right to counsel provision is binding upon the States (Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U. S. 335, 9 L. Ed. 2d 799, 83 S. Ct. 792); that the privilege against self-incrimination is also binding upon the States (Malloy v. Hogan, 378 U. S. 1, 12 L. Ed. 2d 653, 84 S. Ct.

1489); and that by combining the two, the rights exist prior to trial at the time of indictment (Massiah v. United States, 377 U. S. 201, 12 L. Ed. 2d 246, 84 S. Ct. 1199); and even in a police station at the time of arrest (Escobedo v. Illinois, 378 U. S. 478, 12 L. Ed. 2d 977, 84 S. Ct. 1758), even though no specific request for counsel is made (Miranda v. Arizona, —— U. S. ——, 16 L. Ed. 2d 694, 86 S. Ct. 1602).

Can it, then, be logically or legally contended that while one clause of the Sixth Amendment exists at the moment of arrest, another clause of the same Amendment is not applicable and binding even on motions made in the courtroom preliminary to trial? We respectfully contend that an accused is entitled to confront the witnesses against him no later than the preliminary stages of his trial.

It is submitted that Confrontation means Confrontation, and that the Illinois Supreme Court has placed a too narrow, a too confining limitation of the privilege.

This Court is requested by the instant petitioner to now hold that the Illinois Supreme Court erred in the instant case, and that the Confrontation Clause applies to preliminary motions to suppress evidence.

Irrespective of the Quantum and Reliability of the Probable Cause for the Instant Arrest, and Irrespective of the Confrontation Aspect, Discussed Above, the Conduct Exhibited by the Officers in Effectuating the Instant Arrest Sank Far Below Minimum Standards of Decency and Fairness, and Thus Violated Petitioner's Right to Due Process.

After petitioner's arrest he was made to strip down to his underwear in pre-dawn, extremely cold January weather (R. 6, 11, & 17). A search of his person was conducted and heroin was seized (R. 7).

In Beck v. Ohio, 379 U. S. 89, 13 L. Ed. 2d 143, 85 S. Ct. 223, the defendant was arrested and clearinghouse slips were seized in the police station "beneath the sock of his leg." (379 U. S. at 90.) This Court began:

> "There are limits to the permissible scope of a warrantless search incident to lawful arrest, but we proceed on the premise that, if the arrest itself was lawful, those limits were not exceeded here." (379 U. S. 89, 90.)

Accord: Kremen v. United States, 353 U. S. 346, 1 L. Ed. 2d 876, 77 S. Ct. 828.

On the contrary, it is the position of the petitioner under the instant point of this argument that "those limits" were exceeded in the case at bar.

This Court has frequently held that there are more important considerations in a criminal case than merely those of guilt or innocence. More significant, and of far greater import, is the maintenance of the purity of our judicial system. From earliest days this court has made it plain that the courts cannot relax their vigilance and should be ever mindful, in the words of Boyd v. United States, 116 U. S. 616, 29 L. Ed. 746, 752, that:

> "... illegitimate and unconstitutional practices get their first footing in that way, namely: by silent approaches and slight deviations from legal modes of procedure. This can only be obviated by adhering to the rule that constitutional provisions for the security of person and property should be liberally construed. A close and literal construction deprives them of half their efficacy and leads to gradual depreciation of the right, as if it consists more in sound than in substance. It is the duty of courts to be watchful for the constitutional rights of the citizen, and against any stealthy encroachments thereon. Their motto should be obsta principiis."

The Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment does not and could not proscribe all specific reprehensible state conduct:

> "What it does require is that state action, whether through one agency or another, shall be consistent with the fundamental principles of liberty and justice which lie at the base of all our civil and political institutions and not infrequently are designated as 'law of the land.'" [Herbert v. Louisiana, 272 U. S. 312, 316, 71 L. Ed. 270, 273, 47 S. Ct. 103.]

Lawless police action may take many forms. But this Court has always shown itself to be adequately prepared to cope with official illegality whether it be embodied in the known use of perjured testimony:

> "Mazzei, by his testimony, has poisoned the water in this reservoir, and the reservoir cannot be cleansed without first draining it of all impurity. This is a federal criminal case, and this Court has supervisory jurisdiction over the proceedings of the federal courts. If it has any duty to perform in this regard, it is to see that the waters of justice are not polluted. Pollution having taken place here, the condition should be remedied at the earliest opportunity.

"The untainted administration of justice is certainly one of the most cherished aspects of our institutions. Its observance is one of our proudest boasts.

* * * * *

"The government of a strong and free nation does not need convictions based upon such testimony. It cannot afford to abide with them" [Mesarosh v. United States, 352 U. S. 1, 14, 1 L. Ed. 2d 1, 9, 77 S. Ct. 1];

or, coerced confessions:

"We are not impressed by the argument that law enforcement methods such as those under review are necessary to uphold our laws. The Constitution proscribes such lawless means irrespective of the end. And this argument flouts the basic principle that all people must stand on an equality before the bar of justice in every American court" [Chambers v. Florida, 309 U. S. 227, 241, 84 L. Ed. 716, 724, 60 S. Ct. 472]; or, entrapment by government officials or those working for them:

"Law enforcement does not require methods such as this" [Sherman v. United States, 356 U. S. 369, 376, 2 L. Ed. 2d 848, 853, 78 S. Ct. 819]; or, suppression of evidence:

> "We now hold that the suppression by the prosecution of evidence favorable to an accused upon request violates due process where the evidence is material either to guilt or to punishment, irrespective of the good faith or bad faith of the prosecution" [Brady v. Maryland, 373 U. S. 83, 87, 10 L. Ed. 2d 215, 83 S. Ct. 1194].

If one regards this Court as the "One Great Scorer" in all matters legal, the words of Grantland Rice, uttered in another connection in "Alumnus Footfall," seem particularly apropos:

> "For when the One Greater Scorer comes
> To write against your name
> He marks—not that you won or lost
> But how you played the game."

And that, apparently, is what this Court asks the law officials—How did you play the game?

> "From a fair reading of these expressions, we cannot but conclude that the question whether Rogers' confessions were admissible into evidence was answered by reference to a legal standard which took into account the circumstance of probable truth or falsity. And this is not a permissible standard under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. The attention of the trial judge should have been focused, for purposes of the Federal Constitution, on the question whether the behavior of the State's law enforcement officials was such as to overbear petitioner's will to resist and bring about confessions not freely self-determined—a question to be answered with complete disregard of whether or not petitioner in fact spoke the truth." [Rogers v. Richmond, 365 U. S. 534, 540, 5 L. Ed. 2d 760, 81 S. Ct. 735.]

In our society, in our government of laws, there is a "deep-rooted feeling that the police must obey the law while enforcing the law; that in the end life and liberty can be as much endangered from illegal methods used to convict those thought to be criminals as from the actual criminals themselves." [Spano v. New York, 360 U. S. 315, 320, 3 L. Ed. 2d 1265, 79 S. Ct. 1202.]

We have a choice, said Mr. Justice Holmes, dissenting in Olmstead v. United States, 277 U. S. 438, 469, 72 L. Ed. 944, 48 S. Ct. 564:

". . . we must consider the two objects of desire both of which we cannot have and make up our minds which to choose. It is desirable that criminals should be detected, and to that end that all available evidence should be used. It also is desirable that the government should not itself foster and pay for other crimes, when they are the means by which the evidence is to be obtained. If it pays its officers for having got evidence by crime I do not see why it may not as well pay them for getting it in the same way, and I can attach no importance to protestations of disapproval if it knowingly accepts and pays and announces that in future it will pay for the fruits. We have to choose, and for my part I think it a less evil that some criminals should escape than that the government should play an ignoble part."

Dissenting in the same case (involving the constitutionality of the admission into evidence of information secured through wire tapping) Mr. Justice Brandeis stated his abhorrence with the concept of the government as a law breaker:

> "The door of a court is not barred because the plaintiff has committed a crime. The confirmed criminal is as much entitled to redress as his most virtuous fellow citizen; no record of crime, however long, makes one an outlaw. The Court's aid is denied only when he who seeks it has violated the law in connection with the very transaction as to which he seeks legal redress. Then aid is denied despite the defendant's wrong. It is denied in order to maintain respect for law; in order to promote confidence in the administration of justice; in order to preserve the judicial process from contamination. The rule is one, not of action, but of inaction. It is sometimes spoken of as a rule of substantive law. But it extends to matters of procedure as well. A defense may be waived. It is waived when not pleaded. But the objection that the plaintiff comes with unclean hands will be taken by the court itself. It will be taken despite the wish to the contrary of all the parties to the litigation. The court protects itself.
> "Decency, security, and liberty alike demand that government officials shall be subjected to the same rules of conduct that are commands to the citizen. In a government of laws, existence of the government will be imperilled if it fails to observe the law scrupulously. Our government is the potent, the omnipresent, teacher. For good or for ill, it teaches the whole people by its example. Crime is contagious. If the government becomes a law-breaker, it breeds contempt for law; it invites every man to become a law unto himself; it invites anarchy. To declare that in the administration of the criminal law the end justifies the means —to declare that the government may commit crimes in order to secure the conviction of a private criminal would bring terrible retribution. Against that pernicious doctrine this court should resolutely set its face." (277 U. S. 438, 484.)

There is one "transcending value at stake", said Mr. Justice Frankfurter, concurring in Sherman v. United States, 356 U. S. 369, 378, 2 L. Ed. 2d 848, 78 S. Ct. 819, and that is the "Public confidence in the fair and honorable administration of justice, upon which ultimately depends the rule of law." (356 U. S. 369, 380.)

The conduct of the officers in the case at bar: stopping, arresting, and stripping the defendant in zero temperatures so that a search of his person could be conducted is "conduct that shocks the conscience"—it is a "course of proceeding by agents of government to obtain evidence [which] is bound to offend even hardened sensibilities. They are methods too close to the rack and the screw to permit constitutional differentiation". (Rochin v. California, 342 U. S. 165, 172, 96 L. Ed. 183, 72 S. Ct. 205, 25 ALR 2d 1396).

This case indeed illustrates best why "The lawful instruments of the criminal law cannot be entrusted to a single functionary" (McNabb v. United States, 318 U. S. 332, 343, 87 L. Ed. 819, 63 S. Ct. 608).

Conclusion

During the course of the motion to suppress evidence, as aforesaid, the defense counsel asked one of the arresting officers, Officer Jackson, for information concerning the identity of the informer. The following proceedings then occurred:

> "Q. Very cold. What is the name of this informant that gave you this information?
>
> Mr. Engerman: Objection, Your Honor.
>
> The Court: State for the record the reasons for your objection.
>
> Mr. Engerman: Judge, based upon the testimony of the officer so far that they had used this informant for approximately a year, he has worked with this indi [fol. 22] vidual, in the interest of the public, I see no reason why the officer should be forced to disclose the name of the informant, to cause harm or jeopardy to an individual who has cooperated with the police. The City of Chicago have a tremendous problem with narcotics. If the police are not able to withhold the name of the informant they will not be able to get informants. They are not willing to risk their lives if their names become known.
>
> In the interest of the City and the law enforcement of this community, I feel the officer should not be forced to reveal the name of the informant. And I also cite People vs. Durr.
>
> The Court: I will sustain that.
>
> Mr. Adam: Q. Where does this informant live?
>
> Mr. Engerman: Objection, your Honor, same basis.
> The Court: Sustained." (R. 12).

On March 15, 1966, this Honorable Court directed the Office of the Clerk of the Court to request the Honorable William G. Clark, Attorney General of Illinois, to file a response to the petition for certiorari then pending before this Honorable Court. The Attorney General of Illinois did so reply, and on page 7 of their "Brief in Opposition to Petition for Writ of Certiorari", we find the following:

> "If as the petitioner suggests the identity of an informer must be divulged and said informer produced, a needless and tragic blow would be struck to the enforcement of the narcotics laws of the federal and state governments. It would deprive law enforcing officers of a key source of information now utilized to make narcotic arrests. It would destroy the balance between the public interest in protecting the flow of information against the individual's right to prepare his defense. The informer's privilege would be non-existent and society would lose a vital aspect of its defensive arsenal against the narcotic traffic. The courts have generally recognized the proposition that the government need not disclose the name or identity of an informer who had given information which furnished probable cause for arrest, especially which said information is corroborated as in the case at bar." (Citations omitted.)

In essence, then, we believe that it can fairly be said that it is the position of the Respondent, both at the trial level, and before this Court, that the so-called "informer's privilege" should be retained for two reasons:

1.) Protection of the free flow of information; and 2.) Protection of the life and welfare of the informer himself.

The answer to the first of these reasons has been given elsewhere in this brief, and it would merely be repetitious to repeat all that has been said previously on this point.

The answer to the second reason has already been given by this Honorable Court in Piemonte v. United States, 367 U. S. 556, 6 L. Ed. 2d 1028, 81 S. Ct. 1720, a case factually dissimilar from the instant one. In Piemonte, the defendant was convicted of criminal contempt for refusing to answer certain questions after having been granted immunity from prosecution.

In upholding his conviction, this Court said in footnote No. 2, 367 U. S. 556, 559:

> "2. Neither before the Court of Appeals nor here was fear for himself or his family urged by Piemonte as a valid excuse from testifying. Nor would this be a legal excuse. Every citizen of course owes to his society the duty of giving testimony to aid in the enforcement of the law. See Brown v. Walker, 161 U. S. 591, 600, 40 L. Ed. 819, 822, 16 S. Ct. 644. Lord Chancellor Hardwicke's pithy phrase cannot be too often recalled: '[T]he public has a right to every man's evidence.' 12 Hansard's Debates 693; 8 Wigmore, Evidence (3d ed.), p. 64, ¶2192.
> If two persons witness an offense—one being an innocent bystander and the other an accomplice who is thereafter imprisoned for his participation—the latter has no more right to keep silent than the former. The Government of course has an obligation to protect its citizens from harm. But fear of reprisal offers an immunized prisoner no more dispensation from testifying than it does any innocent bystander without a record."

Can it now be contended that this Court should countenance a greater protection for such persons than this Court was willing to confer on private citizens?

In conclusion, then and without passion, yet neither by mincing words, petitioner characterizes what has occurred in this case as merely an extension of an odious and terrifying shadow which almost silently crept into, and now seeks to pervade entirely, our sacred judicial system: The faceless, nameless informer—that scourge of liberty from time immemorial.

Your petitioner is not the first victim. He will not be the last. Yet, better than any case of which we are cognizant, the instant cause illustrates the depths of degradation to which the concept of a secret (but, of course, "reliable") informer has brought us. In the instant case, solely on the word of police officers that they had the word of some "special police informer", an American citizen, in the Sovereign State of Illinois, in the year 1964, was made to strip nearly naked on a public street in extremely cold pre-dawn hours, searched, and then arrested. Petitioner was subsequently convicted of unlawful possession of a narcotic drug. Not once was he allowed to confront his purported accuser. And all this, we are told, is justifiable "in the interest of the City and the law enforcement of this community" (R. 12). How far we have regressed since the days when our founding fathers died for the principle that it is for the purpose of securing liberty that "Governments are instituted among men!"

In a single paragraph of only four sentences the Supreme Court of Illinois recognized, yet swept away, no less than three of petitioner's constitutional guarantees, i.e. the rights of cross-examination, confrontation, and fundamental fairness:

> "We understand that defendant's cross-examination on this issue is limited by the nondisclosure of the informant, but we feel that this right of full cross-examination must give way in the face of a compelling policy to protect informants in the stealthy and vicious traffic in narcotics. The preliminary hearing, and the information given by the informant, did not go to the guilt or innocence of the accused. There is no suggestion that the informant was so involved in defendant's activity that fundamental fairness requires that his identity be revealed for the defense of the charge. (Cf. People v. Mack, 12 Ill. 2d 151, 145 N. E. 2d 609; Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, 77 S. Ct. 623, 1 L. Ed. 2d 639.) Nor is defendant denied the right to face his accuser in any constitutional sense, for nothing the information revealed would be admissible upon the trial of the charge." (People v. McCray, 33 Ill. 2d 66, 210 N. E. 2d 161, 164.)

Petitioner's trial took place in July, 1964, several centuries removed from that day when Socrates was condemned to imbibe "the bitter drink." Yet in an age when men seek to visit other planets, the instant cause illustrates how little, really, we have advanced since Plato tells us Socrates cried:

> "And, hardest of all, I do not know and cannot tell the names of my accusers . . . All who from envy and malice have persuaded you—some of them having first convinced themselves—all this class of men are most difficult to deal with, for I cannot have them up here, and cross-examine them, and therefore I must simply fight with shadows in my own defense, and argue when there is no one who answers."

Rome, too, felt the affliction. Will Durant in Volume III, Caesar and Christ, Simon and Schuster, 1964, p. 262, relates:

"Since Rome had no public prosecutor or attorney general, and (before Augustus) no police, every citizen was empowered and requested to accuse before the courts any person whom he knew to have violated a law. If the accused was condemned, the delator or informer was awarded a fourth of the convicted man's goods, while the state confiscated the rest. Augustus had used this dangerous procedure to enforce his marriage laws. Now, as plots multiplied against Tiberius, delators sprang up to profit from denouncing them; and the supporters of the Prince in the Senate were ready to prosecute such accusations vigorously. The Emperor sought to restrain them. He interpreted the law strictly in the case of persons charged with defaming the memory or statues of Augustus but 'personalities leveled against himself,' says Tacitus, 'were to be let pass unpunished.' He assured the Senate that his mother Livia wished a similar leniency shown to assailants of her good name."

Later in the same work the author tells us: "Delators, who had almost disappeared for a century, returned to activity and favor, and a new terror raged in Rome" (idem p. 447).

One of the most illustrative of the works on informers which we have perused is "Judicial Control of Informants, Spies, Stool Pigeons, and Agents Provocators" by Richard C. Donnelly, 60 Yale L. J. 1091.

"From early times law enforcement authorities have utilized informers. Their value in ferreting out crime was recognized in the ancient practice of English medieval law called approvement. Being arraigned on a charge of treason or felony the approver confessed his guilt and, in order to obtain a pardon, offered to appeal and convict other criminals called appellees. If the appellees were found guilty the approver was pardoned. If the appellees were acquitted, the approver was hanged. The approvement was open to obvious abuses and Sir Matthew Hale observed that 'this course of admitting of approvers hath been long disused, and the truth is, that more mischief hath come to good men by these kind of approvements by false accusations of desperate villians, than benefit to the public by the discovery and convicting of real offenders, gaolers for their own profits often constraining prisoners to appeal honest men.'

"During this period there was no organized police force. Except in the central courts, the administration of justice was in the hands of amateurs whose probity was not infrequently open to suspicion. To create public interest in law enforcement a common expedient was the statutory informer's suit which gave any member of the public the right to sue for, and retain a part of, the penalty imposed for statutory violations. The number of these statutes was large and they greatly increased during the 16th and 17th centuries as a technique for implementing the economic and commercial policy of the times. The informer's suit was also subject to many abuses and Coke classed informers with 'the monopolist, the concealer, and the dispencer with publick and profitable penal laws' as the four varieties of 'viperous vermin, which endeavoured to have eaten out the sides of church and commonwealth.' The informer's suit has survived without mutation to the present day.

"The informer's motivations are legion. In addition to promises of immunity or leniency he may be prompted by revenge, money, fear, jealousy, friendship with members of the police force, or—in the case of the apostate—a desire to re-establish his value position in the community.

"The paid informer may be compensated directly out of police contingency funds, out of resultant fines, or under express statutory authorization. [Idem, p. 1092, footnote #7.]

"The historian Sir Erskine May expressed a view which is rather typical:

'The relations between the government and its informers are of extreme delicacy. . . . [T]o retain in government pay and to reward spies and informers, who consort with conspirators as their sworn accomplices and encourage while they betray them in their crimes, is a practice for which no plea can be offered. No government, indeed, can be supposed to have expressly instructed its spies to instigate the perpetration of crime; but to be unsuspected, every spy must be zealous in the cause which he pretends to have espoused; and his zeal in a criminal enterprise is a direct encouragement of crime. So odious is the character of a spy, that his ignominy is shared by his employers, against whom public feeling has never failed to pronounce itself, in proportion to the infamy of the agent and the complicity of those whom he served.' [Idem, p. 1093, footnote #9.]

* * * * *

"Though considered essential by the police in enforcing vice legislation, the stool pigeon system breeds abominable abuse. Frequently a person who will accept payment from the police to assist in the apprehension of prostitutes, gamblers, and liquor or narcotics violators will also accept payment from these persons to deceive the police. The stool pigeon himself may be a drug addict, pickpocket, pimp, or other petty criminal. The spectacle of government secretly mated with the underworld and using underworld characters to gain its ends is not an ennobling one. The employment of stool pigeons by the police probably arouses more resentment and hatred than any other non-violent abuse. Even confirmed law-breakers have their standards of 'squareness.' To them the stool pigeon situation is the outstanding proof that law enforcement is not square. Contempt for law is thus encouraged. In addition, the temptation to 'frame' a case is great." [Idem, p. 1094.]

Several members of this very Court have protested against the use of unproduced and unidentified informers in any type of a proceeding, especially a judicial one.

Dissenting in Carlson v. Landon, 342 U. S. 524, 96 L. Ed. 547, 72 S. Ct. 525, Mr. Justice Black refers to informers as "a class not usually rated as the most reliable by people who have had experience with them" (342 U. S. 524, 552), and then quotes, in footnote #7, 2 Gibbon, The History of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire (Oxford University Press), pp. 107, 108 as follows:

> "'Anonymous information ought not to be received in any sort of prosecution. It is introducing a very dangerous precedent and is quite foreign to the spirit of our age.' Written near 100 A.D. by Emperor Trajan to Pliny the Younger in response to Pliny's interesting report of his prosecution of Christians. 9 Harvard Classics, 428. Pliny was 'in great doubt' even then as to 'whether the very profession of Christianity, unattended with any criminal act, or only the crimes themselves inherent in the profession are punishable. . . .' Supra, 426. 'If they [informers against Christians] succeeded in their prosecution, they were exposed to the resentment of a considerable and active party, to the censure of the more liberal portion of mankind, and to the ignominy which in every age and country has attended the character of an informer. If, on the contrary, they failed in their proofs, they incurred the severe and perhaps capital penalty which, according to a law published by the emperor Hadrian, was inflicted on those who falsely attributed to their fellow-citizens the crime of Christianity.'" [342 U. S. 524, 542.]

Writing again in dissent in Jay v. Boyd, 351 U. S. 345, 100 L. Ed. 1242, 76 S. Ct. 919, Mr. Justice Black expressed even more completely his obvious contempt for a deportation proceeding in which faceless accusers were allowed to spread their tales while maintaining their anonymity. The full power of his dissent is adumbrated in its opening words: "This is a strange case in a country dedicated by its founders to the maintenance of liberty under law." (351 U. S. at 362.) He then goes on to state:

> "No nation can remain true to the ideal of liberty under law and at the same time permit people to have their homes destroyed and their lives blasted by the slurs of unseen and unsworn informers. There is no possible way to contest the truthfulness of anonymous accusations. The supposed accuser can neither be identified nor interrogated. He may be the most worthless and irresponsible character in the community. What he said may be wholly malicious, untrue, unreliable, or inaccurately reported. In a court of law the triers of fact could not even listen to such gossip, must less decide the most trifling issue on it.

> "No amount of legal reasoning by the Court and no rationalization that can be devised can disguise the fact that the use of anonymous information to banish people is not consistent with the principles of a free country. Unfortunately there are some who think that the way to save freedom in this country is to adopt the techniques of tyranny. One technique which is always used to maintain absolute power in totalitarian governments is the use of anonymous information by government against those who are obnoxious to the rulers. In connection with another case like this [footnote citation] I referred to a statement made by the Roman Emperor Trajan to Pliny the Younger around the end of the First Century. Rome at that time was prosecuting the Christians for alleged subversive activities. Pliny expressed his doubts to Trajan as to the best method of handling the prosecutions. He wrote Trajan, 'An anonymous information was laid before me containing a charge against several persons, who upon examination denied they were Christians, or had ever been so. . . .' Trajan replied, 'You have adopted the right course, my dearest Secundus, in investigating the charges against the Christians who were brought before you. . . . Anonymous informations ought not to be received in any sort of prosecution. It is introducing a very dangerous precedent, and is quite foreign to the spirit of our age.'

"It was also foreign to the brave spirit of the American age that gave birth to our constitutional system of courts with their comprehensive safeguards for fair public trials. In those courts a defendant's fate is to be determined by independent judges and juries who hear evidence given by witnesses in their presence and in the presence of the accused. But this case shows how far we have departed from the carefully conceived plan to safeguard individual liberty. Although the Court today pays lip service to judicial review, a hearing officer's condemnation of Jay is held final and unreviewable. His condemnation is an open defiance of all the public testimony given, and rests exclusively on 'confidential information' he claims to have received from unrevealed sources. Unfortunately this condemnation of Jay on anonymous information is not unusual—it manifests the popular fashion in these days of fear. Legal rationalizations have been contrived to shift trials from constitutional courts to temporary removable appointees like the hearing officer who decided against Jay. And when an accused rises to defend himself before such an officer he is met by a statement that 'We have evidence that you are guilty of something, but we cannot tell you what, nor who gave us the evidence.' If, taking the Bill of Rights seriously he complains he is met by the rather impatient rejoinder that the Government's safety would be jeopardized by according him the kind of trial the Constitution commands. But the core of our constitutional system is that individual liberty must never be taken away by shortcuts, that fair trials in independent courts must never be dispensed with. That system is in grave danger. This case emphasizes that fact. Prosecution of any sort on anonymous information is still too dangerous, just as it was when Trajan rejected it nearly two thousand years ago. Those who prize liberty would do well to ponder this." [351 U. S. at 368.]

Mr. Justice Black is not alone among the members of this Court in his protests against what the late Mr. Justice Jackson, writing for the Court in On Lee v. United States, 343 U. S. 747, 96 L. Ed. 1270, 72 S. Ct. 967, referred to as "dirty business [which] may raise serious questions of credibility." (343 U. S. 747, 757.)

Mr. Justice Douglas has protested powerfully, both in and out of Court, against the use of this highly unAmerican practice. In his book, An Almanac of Liberty, Doubleday & Co., Garden City, N. Y., 1954, p. 146, we find the following:

"The use of statements by informers who need not confront the person under investigation or accusation has such an infamous history that it should be rooted out from our procedure. A hearing at which faceless people are allowed to present their whispered rumors and yet escape the test and torture of cross-examination is not a hearing in the Anglo-American sense. We cannot be proud of the practice—whether the life of a man is at stake, or his reputation, or any matter touching upon his status or his rights.

"If F. B. I. reports were disclosed in administrative or judicial proceedings, it may be that valuable underground sources would dry up. But that is not the choice. If the aim is to protect the underground of informers, the F. B. I. report need not be used. If it is used, then fairness requires that the names of the accusers be disclosed. Without the identity of the informer, the person investigated or accused stands helpless. The prejudices, the credibility, the passions, the perjury of the informer are never known. If they were exposed, the whole charge might wither under the cross-examination."

Again, in the Anatomy of Liberty, Credo Series, Trident Press, New York, 1963, p. 30, Mr. Justice Douglas says:

"The 'faceless informer'—one who dares not come into the open and undergo cross-examination—has been a curse to liberty throughout history. His abuses, as we shall see, are the reasons why the right of confrontation was written into the Sixth Amendment of the United States Constitution."

After joining with Mr. Justice Black in the dissent of Mr. Justice Frankfurter in United States v. Nugent, 346 U. S. 1, 97 L. ed. 1417, 73 S. Ct. 991, Mr. Justice Douglas added a word of his own:

"I concur in Mr. Justice Frankfurter's opinion and only add a word. The use of statements by informers who need not confront the person under investigation or accusation has such an infamous history that it should be rooted out from our procedure. A hearing at which these faceless people are allowed to present their whispered rumors and yet escape the test and torture of cross-examination is not a hearing in the Anglo-American sense. We should be done with the practice—whether the life of a man is at stake, or his reputation, or any matter touching upon his status or his rights. If FBI reports are disclosed in administrative or judicial proceedings, it may be that valuable underground sources will dry up. But that is not the choice. If the aim is to protect the underground of informers, the FBI report need not be used. If it is used, then fairness requires that the names of the accusers be disclosed. Without the identity of the informer the person investigated or accused stands helpless. The prejudices, the credibility, the passions, the perjury of the informer are never known. If they were exposed, the whole charge might wither under the cross-examination." [346 U. S. 1, 13.]

Expanding on this same thesis a little later in Peters v. Hobby, 349 U. S. 331, 99 L. Ed. 1129, 75 S. Ct. 790, Mr. Justice Douglas said:

"Dr. Peters was condemned by faceless informers, some of whom were not known even to the Board that condemned him. Some of these informers were not even under oath. None of them had to submit to cross-examination. None had to face Dr. Peters. So far as we or the Board know, they may be psychopaths or venal people, like Titus Oates, who revel in being informers. They may bear old grudges. Under cross-examination their stories might disappear like bubbles. Their whispered confidences might turn out to be yarns conceived by twisted minds or by people who though sincere, have poor faculties of observation and memory.

Confrontation and cross-examination under oath are essential if the American ideal of due process is to remain a vital force in our public life. We deal here with the reputation of men and their right to work—things more precious than property itself. We have here a system where government with all its power and authority condemns a man to a suspect class and the outer darkness, without the rudiments of a fair trial. The practice of using faceless informers has apparently spread through a vast domain. It is used not only to get rid of employees in the Government, but also employees who work for private firms having contracts with the Government. It has touched countless hundreds of men and women and ruined many. It is an un-American practice which we should condemn. It deprives men of 'liberty' within the meaning of the Fifth Amendment, for one of man's most precious liberties is his right to work. When a man is deprived of that 'liberty' without a fair trial, he is denied due process. If he were condemned by Congress and made ineligible for government employment, he would suffer a bill of attainder, outlawed by the Constitution. See United States v. Lovett, 328 U. S. 303, 90 L. Ed. 1252, 66 S. Ct. 1073. An administrative agency—the creature of Congress—certainly cannot exercise powers that Congress itself is barred from asserting. See the opinion of Mr. Justice Black in Joint Anti-Fascist Refugee Committee v. McGrath, 341 U. S. 123, 144-146, 95 L. Ed. 817, 839, 840, 71 S. Ct. 624.

> Those who see the force of this position counter by saying that the Government's sources of information must be protected. If the campaign against subversives is to be successful. The answer is plain. If the sources of information need protection, they should be kept secret. But once they are used to destroy a man's reputation and deprive him of his 'liberty' they must be put to the test of due process of law. The use of faceless informers is wholly at war with that concept. When we relax our standards to accommodate the faceless informer, we violate our basic constitutional guarantees and ape the tactics of those whom we despise." [349 U. S. 331, 350.]

Accord: See Dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Douglas, Jay v. Boyd, 351 U. S. 345, 374.

Chief Justice Warren examined the problem in Green v. McElroy, 360 U. S. 474, 3 L. Ed. 2d 1377, 79 S. Ct. 1400, where he wrote (360 U. S. 474, 496):

> "Certain principles have remained relatively immutable in our jurisprudence. One of these is that where governmental action seriously injures an individual, and the reasonableness of the action depends on fact findings, the evidence used to prove the Government's case must be disclosed to the individual so that he has an opportunity to show that it is untrue. While this is important in the case of documentary evidence, it is even more important where the evidence consists of the testimony of individuals whose memory might be faulty or who, in fact, might be perjurers or persons motivated by malice, vindictiveness, intolerance, prejudice, or jealousy. We have formalized these protections in the requirements of confrontation and cross-examination. They have ancient roots. They find expression in the Sixth Amendment which provides that in all criminal cases the accused shall enjoy the right 'to be confronted with the witnesses against him.' This Court has been zealous to protect these rights from erosion."

* * * * *

He, too, referred to the days of Rome:

"When Festus more than two thousand years ago reported to King Agrippa that Felix had given him a prisoner named Paul and that the priests and elders desired to have judgment against Paul, Festus is reported to have stated: 'It is not the manner of the Romans to deliver any man to die, before that he which is accused have the accusers face to face, and have license to answer for himself concerning the crime laid against him.' Acts 25:16." [360 U. S. 474, 497.]

At least one President of the United States has been infected with the spirit of fairness which only confrontation can bring.

In a Press release of his remarks on November 23, 1953, on receiving the Democratic Legacy Award on the occasion of the 40th anniversary of the Anti-Defamation League, President Eisenhower told of the simple code of fairness by which he grew up:

"It was: meet anyone face to face with whom you disagree. You could not sneak up on him from behind, or do any damage to him, without suffering the penalty of an outraged citizenry. If you met him face to face and took the same risks he did, you could get away with almost anything, as long as the bullet was in the front.

"And today, although none of you has the great fortune, I think, of being from Abilene, Kansas, you live after all by that same code, in your ideals and in the respect you give to certain qualities. In this country, if someone dislikes you, or accuses you, he must come up in front. He cannot hide behind the shadow. He cannot assassinate you or your character from behind, without suffering the penalties an outraged citizenry will impose."

Respectfully, this Court should require no less that the "bullet [be] in the front."

Petitioner earnestly, respectfully and prayerfully exhorts this Court to reverse the judgment of conviction rendered by the Illinois Courts.

Respectfully submitted,

IN THE

Supreme Court of the United States

OCTOBER TERM, A. D. 1966

NO. 159

GEORGE McCRAY,

Petitioner,

vs.

ILLINOIS,

Respondent.

(On Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois.)

BRIEF FOR RESPONDENT.

QUESTIONS PRESENTED.

1) Whether the arrest of George McCray and the subsequent search and the seizure of narcotics from him was constitutionally permissible where it was predicated upon information supplied to arresting officers by a reliable informant?

2) Whether the State is required to disclose the identity of a reliable informant and produce that informant at the trial where the informant did not participate in the crime of possession of narcotics of which the petitioner is charged?

3) Whether the manner in which the search of George McCray was conducted was such that it was shocking to the conscience?

STATEMENT OF FACTS.

The Statement of Facts contained in the brief for the Petitioner (Br. 4-5) is incomplete. It is therefore necessary for the Respondent to restate the facts.

George McCray, petitioner, was arrested for possession of narcotics on January 16, 1964 at 7:00 A. M. in the vicinity of 49th Street and Calumet Avenue in Chicago, Illinois (Tr. 16). His arrest was based upon information supplied by an informer, who told the arresting officers he had just observed McCray selling narcotics in the area (Tr. 18-19).

Prior to the trial, the petitioner filed a motion to suppress the narcotics taken from him pursuant to his arrest and subsequent search (Tr. 3-5).

At the hearing on the motion to suppress, McCray testified that at about 5:30 A. M. on January 16, 1964, he was arrested in the vicinity of 49th and Calumet (Tr. 6). He stated that the officers took off his coats and then had him completely undress in the squad car prior to making him get out of the car in very cold weather with only his pants half on and in his underclothes (Tr. 7). He testified that at that time the officer showed him a cigarette package with some tin foil in it. He alleged that it was not his. A few statements later, he admitted the cigarette package was his and that whatever was in it belonged to him (Tr. 7).

McCray further testified that a half hour before being arrested at 5:30 A. M he had been at a friend's house at 48th and Forestville (Tr. 7). He did not identify the friend nor produce him at the hearing as a witness.

Both Officers Jackson and Arnold testified that they had known the informant for over a year (Tr. 8, 15) and that he had supplied them with information concerning narcotics activities which had resulted in numerous arrests and convictions (Tr. 8, 12, 13, 14, 15).

Approximately ten minutes later, after cruising the immediate vicinity, the officers and the informant saw the petitioner at 48th and South Park Avenue (Tr. 10). The informant pointed out the defendant and got out of the car and left (Tr. 10). The officers then followed McCray into an alley at approximately 49th and South Park where McCray upon looking up and seeing the police car began to walk hurriedly between two buildings at about 4847 South Calumet Avenue (Tr. 10, 16). It was at this point that the officers arrested McCray (Tr. 11). Officer Arnold then ordered McCray into the car saying "Get into the car. It is too cold out" (Tr. 17). While he was in the car, the officers made him remove his outer coat (Tr. 17).

It was at this point that McCray attempted to hide the cigarette package with five foil wrapped packets inside (Tr. 17).

The motion to suppress was denied and McCray was convicted as charged without introducing any evidence in his defense at trial (Tr. 19). Illinois Supreme Court affirmed the conviction (Tr. 20-25) and certiorari was subsequently granted by this Court (Tr. 28).

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT.

The People of the State of Illinois, respondent, submit that the decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois should be affirmed for:

1) An arrest is clearly valid when predicated on the information of a reliable informant which is based on fact and corroborated by the surrounding circumstances. Draper v. United States, 358 U. S. 307 and Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U. S. 108.

2) The arrest and search of George McCray was valid for it was predicated upon the substantiated information supplied by a reliable informant.

3) A State is not required to disclose the identity of an informant where he has not participated in the perpetration of the crime and the accused is charged with the possession of narcotics. Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53; Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U. S. 108; Rugendorf v. United States, 376 U. S. 528; United States v. Ventresca, 380 U. S. 102.

4) The State is not required to disclose the name of the informer in the case at bar for the standards set forth by this Court in the application of the government privilege of non-disclosure of the idenity of a reliable informant, are based upon sound public policy and are fully satisfied.

5) The conduct of the arresting officers in conducting the search of George McCray was commensurate with the nature of the offense and was not performed in a manner that is shocking to the conscience.

ARGUMENT.

I.

THE ARREST AND SEARCH OF GEORGE McCRAY AND THE SUBSEQUENT SEIZURE OF CONTRABAND FROM HIM WAS CONSTITUTIONALLY VALID FOR IT WAS PREDICATED UPON INFORMATION SUPPLIED TO THE ARRESTING OFFICERS BY A RELIABLE INFORMANT.

Petitioner's initial proposition of law is that, in the absence of a warrant, a valid search and seizure may not be predicated upon an invalid arrest. (Br. 8-10). The People of the State of Illinois fully agree with this principle but state that it is equally well established that a search incident to a valid arrest is proper. Draper v. United States, 358 U. S. 307, 311; Weeks v. United States, 232 U. S. 383, 392. Thus if the arrest of George McCray, petitioner, by Officers Jackson and Arnold on the morning of January 16, 1964, was constitutionally valid, the subsequent search and seizure was valid. The initial question presented is, therefore, whether the arrest in this case was in fact a valid arrest.

An arrest is clearly valid when predicated on the information of a reliable informant, which is based on fact, and is corroborated by the surrounding circumstances.

The states are permitted to develop workable rules governing arrests, searches and seizures to meet the practical demands of effective criminal investigation in law enforcement with the one proviso that those rules do not violate the constitutional proscription of unreasonable searches and seizures. Ker v. California, 374 U. S. 23, 34.

In accord therewith, Section 107 of Illinois Criminal Law and Procedure (Ill. Rev. Stat. 1963, ch. 38, par. 107) provides in part:

>
> * * * * * *
> "(c) He has reasonable grounds to believe that the person is committing or has committed an offense."

This criterion for a valid arrest by a police officer without a warrant is the same as that developed and enacted by the Congress of the United States. Rule 41 of Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure; Section 3052 and 3056 of Crimes and Criminal Procedure (18 U.S.C. § 3052 and 3056).

This Court has interpreted the aforementioned criterion in relation to the arrest of a person based upon information supplied by an unidentified informant in the recent cases of Draper v. United States, 358 U. S. 307 and Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U. S. 108.

In the Draper case, in defining probable cause, Mr. Justice Whittaker, quoting and adopting earlier decisions, said (p. 313):

> "Probable cause exists where 'the facts and circumstances within (the arresting officers') knowledge and of which they had reasonably trustworthy information (are) sufficient in themselves to warrant a man of reasonable caution in the belief that an offense has been or is being committed. Carroll v. United States, 267 U. S. 132, 162."

In applying this principle to the facts, in Draper this Court noted an experienced federal narcotics agent was told by an informer, whose information the agent had found to be true and correct in the past, that Draper, whom the agent did not know, was peddling narcotics to several addicts in Denver. Four days later the informant told the agent that Draper had gone to Chicago and was going to return on either the morning of the next day or the morning thereafter with a supply of heroin. The informer gave the agent a detailed physical description of Draper and the clothing he was wearing. Draper did not arrive on the following morning but did arrive on the morning thereafter wearing the precise clothing described by the informant. The agent then arrested Draper, without a warrant, and a subsequent search revealed two envelopes containing heroin.

This Court held that the agent had probable cause to arrest Draper upon the information received from the informant because the informant had been established to be reliable, and especially so in light of the fact his statement was corroborated by other matters within the officer's knowledge.

In Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U. S. 108, two Houston police officers obtained a state search warrant for narcotics allegedly concealed in Aguilar's home. Their affidavit in support of the application stated that they had received reliable information from a credible person and believed that certain contraband materials were being kept, on the premises, for the purpose of sale and use contrary to the provisions of law. This Court held that the search warrant was invalid but said that if it had been established how the informer had reached his conclusion and evidence of his reliability had been shown, the warrant would have been proper and the arrest valid.

Reading these two cases together there can be no question but that information from an informer constitutes probable cause to support an arrest and subsequent search and seizure if the following conditions are met. The first condition is that there be evidence of the reliability of the informant; secondly, there be evidence of how the informer came into possession of the information supplied to the officers; and thirdly, the information supplied by the informant be supported by the facts and circumstances attendant to the arrest. If these three criteria are met, an officer clearly "has reasonable ground to believe that the person to be arrested is committing or has committed an offense." While it is not believed that all three conditions must be met in any given case, the satisfaction of all three in this cause leaves no other conclusion but that probable cause existed.

The arrest and search of George McCray was valid for it was predicated upon corroborated information supplied by a reliable informant.

George McCray was arrested for possession of narcotics on January 16, 1964 at approximately 7:00 A. M. (Tr. 10) in the vicinity of 49th Street and Calumet Avenue in Chicago, Illinois (Tr. 16).

On January 16, 1964, Officers Johnson, Arnold and Nance met with an informant in their car in the vicinity of 47th and Calumet Avenue, Chicago, Illinois between 6:50 and 6:55 A. M. (Tr. 17). The informant told the officers that "Boobie George", who was personally known to them as George McCray, was selling narcotics and had narcotics on his person in the vicinity, where the informant had just observed the petitioner selling narcotics to various people (Tr. 18-19).

Both Officers Jackson and Arnold testified that they had known the informant for over a year (Tr. 8, 15) and that he had supplied them with information concerning narcotics activities which had resulted in numerous arrests and convictions (Tr. 8, 12, 13, 14, 15).

Approximately ten minutes later, after cruising the immediate vicinity, the officers and the informant saw the petitioner at 48th and South Park Avenue (Tr. 10). The informant pointed out the defendant and got out of the car and left (Tr. 10). The officers then followed McCray into an alley at approximately 49th and South Park where McCray upon looking up and seeing the police car began to walk hurriedly between two buildings at about 4847 South Calumet Avenue (Tr. 10, 16). The officers then placed him under arrest and placed him in the car and began the search (Tr. 11, 17). During the course of the search, the officers noticed the petitioner attempting to hide a cigarette package under the back seat (Tr. 11, 17). Officer Arnold recovered the package which contained five foil wrapped packages which contained the contraband in question (Tr. 11, 17).

The arrest of George McCray was constitutionally permissible for it was accomplished in a manner that complied with the three conditions suggested by this Court as a basis for probable cause.

(1) Reliability of Informant.

Both Officers Jackson and Arnold testified that the informant had supplied them with information relating to narcotics activities over a long period of time which had resulted in numerous arrests and convictions.

(2) The Basis of the Information Supplied by the Informant.

The informant told Officers Jackson and Arnold that George McCray was selling narcotics and had the narcotics on his person in the vicinity of 47th and Calumet Avenue. The officers further testified that the informant told them that he knew that this information was true for he had seen McCray selling narcotics to various people just prior to meeting the officers.

(3) Surrounding Facts and Circumstances.

The surrounding facts and circumstances which took place subsequent to receiving the information from the reliable informer corroborated that information. In the first instance, they found the petitioner, whom they knew on sight, in the immediate vicinity. This encounter took place within ten minutes after informant told the officers that the petitioner had narcotics on his person in the area. Upon seeing the police car, the petitioner attempted to evade the police by hurrying between buildings. These circumstances, fully corroborated the information received.

The petitioner suggests that probable cause for arrest should not be permitted where based on information supplied by an informant where the officers have not first obtained an arrest or search warrant (Br. 13-25). They argue that the police are so untrustworthy that probable cause must be determined only by a judge or magistrate (Br. 26, 32).

Petitioner's contention would negate the acts of Congress which make specific provision for arrest without a warrant (Rule 41 of Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure; Sections 3052 and 3056 of Crimes and Criminal Procedure

(18 U. S. C. § 3052 and 3056) and run contra to the decisions of this Court and Federal Courts of Appeals.[1]

Certainly, there are situations which require immediate action of the police, as in the case at bar. The informant had just observed McCray selling narcotics in the vicinity (Tr. 18, 19). The arrest came within ten minutes after the officers learned of the crime (Tr. 10). If they had attempted to secure a warrant it is more than likely that the accused would have left the vicinity or disposed of the contraband material. This was not a situation in which the accused was within his dwelling unit or other specific place in which he may likely have hidden the narcotics. He was working on the street (Tr. 18). Under the circumstances the police were required to make a decision. That decision is whether they had reasonable grounds to believe that the petitioner was committing a crime. As we have established they did have probable cause to arrest the petitioner. Petitioner's contention is without merit.

The arrest of George McCray was valid and in full accord with the statutory and judicial precedent required of an arrest without a warrant. The arrest being valid, the subsequent search and seizure of the contraband narcotics was also constitutionally valid.

II

THE STATE WAS NOT REQUIRED TO DIVULGE THE IDENTITY NOR PRODUCE THE INFORMANT UNDER THE CIRCUMSTANCES IN THIS CASE.

Historically the government possesses a privilege to withhold from disclosure the identity of persons who have furnished information of violations of law to officers charged with the enforcement of that law. The purpose of the privilege is the furtherance and protection of the public interest in effective law enforcement. The privilege recognizes the obligation of every citizen to inform law-enforcement officials of the commission of crimes and by preserving their identity, encourage them to perform this obligation to society. Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53; Scher v. United States, 305 U. S. 251; In re Quarles and Butler, 158 U. S. 532; Vogel v. Graue, 110 U. S. 311. This privilege is not absolutely right but must be balanced with the rights of the accused. However, we will establish that the governmental privilege should and must be given cognizance under the facts and circumstances in the case at bar.

A.

The state is not required to divulge the identity of an informant where he has not participated in the perpetration of the crime and the accused is charged with possession of narcotics.

In Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, in which Albert Roviaro was indicted on two counts, one the sale of heroin and the second, that he fraudulently and knowingly received, concealed, bought and facilitated the transportation and concealment after importation of heroin, this Court clarified the privilege and established the standards for its use.

In Roviaro this Court said (p. 62):

> "We believe that no fixed rule with respect to disclosure is justifiable. The problem is one that calls for balancing the public interest in protecting the flow of information against the individual's right to prepare his defense. Whether a proper balance renders nondisclosure erroneous must depend on the particular circumstances of each case, taking into consideration the crime charged, the possible defenses, the possible significance of the informer's testimony, and other relevant factors."

In evaluating the facts, the Court held (p. 64) that the identity of the informer was required because the informer was the sole participant, other than the accused, in the transaction charged and further stated (p. 65) that the charge therein was not mere possession.

Roviaro thus establishes, by dicta, that the identity of an informer is required to be disclosed only where the informant is a participant in the crime and clearly not where the charge is merely that of "possession". This interpretation has been consistently reiterated and adopted by the federal courts.[2]

2. Garibay-Garcia v. United States, 362 F. 2d 509 (C.A. 9th, 1966); United States v. D'Angiolillo, 340 F. 2d 453 (C.A. 2nd, 1965), cert. denied, 380 U. S. 955 (1965); United States v. Konigsberg, 336 F. 2d 844 (C. A. 3rd, 1964), cert. denied, 379 U. S. 933 (1964); United States ex rel. Drew v. Meyers, 327 F. 2d 174 (C. A. 3rd, 1964), cert. denied, 379 U. S. 847 (1964); Williams v. United States, 273 F. 2d 781 (C. A. 9th, 1960), cert. denied, 362 U. S. 951 (1960); Miller v. United States, 273 F. 2d 279 (C. A. 5th, 1959), cert. denied, 362 U. S. 298 (1960), Pegram v. United States, 267 F. 2d 781 (C. A. 6th, 1959).

Subsequent to the rendition of the decision in Roviaro, this Court considered the question in the case of Rugendorf v. United States, 376 U. S. 528. In that case the petitioner was convicted of knowingly receiving and concealing 81 stolen fur pieces which had been transported in interstate commerce. The petitioner asserted that he was entitled to the name of the informer who had reported seeing the furs in his basement in order to defend himself because the informant alone knew whether he participated with persons, other than the defendant, in placing the furs in the basement. This Court held that they did not have to reach the issue because the petitioner asserted it for the first time in his reply brief in the Court of Appeals. However by way of dicta, it tacitly readopted its holding in Roviaro, that the disclosure is required only where the informant had played a direct and prominent part, as the sole participant with the accused, in the very offense for which the latter was convicted.

In Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U. S. 108, this Court reversed the conviction of the petitioner for the crime of possession of narcotics because the affidavit supporting the search warrant did not contain any underlying circumstances relied on by the person providing the information which disclosed that the informant or his information was reliable. In so holding, Mr. Justice Goldberg said (p. 114):

> "Although an affidavit may be based on hearsay information and need not reflect the direct personal observations of the affiant, Jones v. United States, 362 U. S. 257, the magistrate must be informed of some of the underlying circumstances from which the informant concluded that the narcotics were where he claimed they were, and some of the underlying circumstances from which the officer concluded that the informant, whose identity need not be disclosed, see Rugendorf v. United States, 376 U. S. 528, was 'credible' or his information 'reliable.'" (Emphasis added).

Thus the Court again readopted the principle that in the crime of "possession" where the informant is not a participant, his identity is not required to be disclosed.

In United States v. Ventresca, 380 U. S. 102, the Court held that probable cause existed for the issuance of a warrant for the crime of illegal possession and operation of a distillery. In so holding, Mr. Justice Goldberg adopted and cited his aforementioned quotation from Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U. S. 108.

Since the decision in Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, this Court has consistently held that the identity of an informer is not required to be disclosed where the informant is not a participant in the crime with the accused and clearly not where the charge is illegal "possession".

It is therefore submitted that if the identity of the informant in the case at bar is required to be disclosed, such a holding would be in direct opposition to the aforementioned cases and it would be required that they be overruled, for in the case at bar, the unidentified informant did not participate, in any manner, in the crime of possession of narcotics of which McCray was convicted.

B.

The state should not be required to disclose the name of the informer, in this case, for the standards set forth by this Court are based upon sound public policy and are fully satisfied.

The ultimate problem presented to this Court is whether the State is required to divulge the identity of an informant, where the informant did not participate in the crime, and the accused was charged with possession of narcotics. Its solution calls for the balancing of the public interest in protecting the flow of information with the fundamental principle that an individual accused of a crime is entitled to full and fair opportunity to defend himself. Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53.

The People of the State of Illinois submit that there are compelling reasons for this Court to reiterate and reaffirm the principles enunciated in the aforementioned cases.

In the first instance, in order that the various federal, state and local law-enforcement agencies may properly preserve the rights and privileges of its citizens, they are required to rely upon information supplied to them by informers. (Harney and Cross, The Informer In Law Enforcement, (1960) pp. 6-12). It is difficult to characterize the benefit of society occasioned by this flow of information in a mere numerical or percentile quotation. But we believe that this Court is cognizant that this aspect of crime detection provides a significant portion of arrests and convictions of serious crimes throughout our country. Not only is the use of the informer helpful but perhaps it can be characterized as an integral instrument to maintain the peace and dignity of a community and secure the citizenry in the exercise of their constitutionally guaranteed rights.

Specifically, if we reduce the question in issue to a single informant, it is apparent that if his identity is revealed to the criminal element, the law-enforcement agencies have lost the use of a valuable asset. The informant will henceforth be foreclosed from gathering information which would be necessary or helpful to the police. (Harney and Cross, The Informer In Law Enforcement, (1960) p. 63).

The major danger to which this informant would be exposed, if his identity were revealed, is the retaliation which would befall him by the criminal elements who despise him and fear him. (Harney and Cross, The Informer In Law Enforcement, (1960) p. 4). The decisions of our courts are replete with recognition of the fact that an informer literally risks his life by volunteering information to law-enforcement authorities.[3]

Mr. Justice Clark, in Rovario v. United States, 153 U. S. 53, took cognizance of this situation and observed (p. 67):

> "Once an informant is known the drug traffickers are quick to retaliate. Dead men tell no tales. The old penalty of tongue removal, once visited upon the informer Larunda, has been found obsolete."

In Schuster v. City of New York, 5 N. Y. 2d 75, 154 N.E. 2d 534 (C.A. N.Y. 1958), the Court after taking cognizance of the death of an informant, discussed the possibility that not only does a governmental agency have a moral obligation to protect an informant but may have a duty under law to do so.

It logically follows and is well accepted that informers will be unwilling to expose themselves to the aforementioned dangers, by furnishing information, if disclosure of their identity is required. Law which would require disclosure of an informers identity would mean the immediate loss of practically all existing and potential informants to the direct detriment of society.

Having established that the informant is an integral and important part of the general enforcement of laws for the benefit of society, the People of the State of Illinois submit that the informant is an absolute necessity for an adequate control of crimes involving narcotics. In the narcotic field, as in any crime where we are confronted with a willing victim, there are usually no complaining witnesses and the only effective manner in which the police can apprehend and convict violators is through the use of information supplied by confidential informants. The traffickers in narcotics are universally unwilling to deal with a stranger, and the difficulties of the law enforcement agent to gain the confidence of an individual engaged in this enterprise can only be characterized as nearly impossible. (Harney and Cross, The Informer In Law Enforcement (1960) pp. 18-19).

Mr. Justice Clark observed in Rovario v. United States, 353 U. S. 53 (p. 66):

> "First, it is well to remember that the illegal traffic in narcotic drugs poses a most serious social problem. One need only read the newspaper to gauge its enormity. No crime leads more directly to the commission of other offenses. Moreover, it is a most difficult crime to detect and prove. Because drugs come in small pills or powder and are readily packaged in capsules or glassine containers, they may be easily concealed. They can be carried on the person or even in the body crevasses where detection is almost impossible. Enforcement is, therefore, most difficult without the use of 'stool pigeons' or informants."

The balancing of the rights within this area presents a dilemma of great consequence. If this Court requires the disclosure of the identity of a non-participant informer in the crime of possession of narcotics, the police will most certainly be unable to effectively combat one of our most serious social problems to the ultimate detriment of society. In view of the necessity of the utilization of informants, this Court should adhere to the principles which it has previously established and demand the disclosure of the identity of an informant only within the bounds specified therein.

The petitioner alleges that the informant must be produced for the informant could establish that he was not selling narcotics in the vicinity for petitioner testified he was at the home of a friend. He further alleged that disclosure would reveal if the informant actually existed (Br. 24, 38-40).

The allegations can be reduced to the single proposition that the testimony of the informant may reveal that the police were lying. However, an examination of the testimony, in the light of credibility of the witnesses, dispells any circumstances which would reflect any doubt on the veracity of the police officers. Contrary to the testimony of the accused, which was inconsistent, the testimony of the officers was clear, convincing, totally consistent and corroborated.

McCray testified that he was at the home of a friend shortly before he was arrested (Tr. 7). Yet he failed to produce this alleged friend to corroborate this allegation. Even if accepted as true, this allegation does not establish that he was not selling the narcotics in the vicinity of 47th and Calumet shortly before 7:00 A.M. because he testified he left his friends a half hour before 5:30 A.M. (Tr. 7). To establish the petitioner's lack of credibility, at one point during his testimony he alleged that the cigarette package which contained the contraband material was not his (Tr. 7). Yet he subsequently admitted that it was his packet (Tr. 7).

Perhaps, if on cross examination the petitioner had impeached the officers in some manner which gave rise to a doubt as to their veracity, it could be required that the informer testify in order to clarify the facts. However, such is not the case here, for the testimony of the officers was not impeached.

If the petitioner is permitted to demand the disclosure of the identity of the informer merely by alleging a dispute in the testimony (in this case the fact that he was at the house of a friend), the governmental privilege would be non-existent for it would merely require the accused, who under normal circumstances would do or say anything to retain his freedom, to allege a discrepancy of fact. Such a result would not be based on sound precedural law.

In relation to the contention that he has an inalienable right to cross-examine, we submit that this has been fully exhausted, within the discussion of the balancing of the rights of the accused against the public policy of non-disclosure of an informant's identity and need not be considered here.

The petitioner has completely failed to establish that the identity of the informant was necessary for his defense and therefore the governmental privilege of disclosure was properly applied.

The recent decisions of this Court have consistently held that a governmental agency is not required to divulge the identity of an informant where the informant did not participate in the crime and where the crime is one of possession. We have established that the welfare of society requires the reiteration and affirmance of this rule for if disclosure is required, the ultimate effect would be disastrous.

III

THE SEARCH OF THE PETITIONER SUBSEQUENT TO HIS VALID ARREST WAS LAWFUL.

The parties agree that if the arrest of the petitioner was valid, the subsequent search and seizure was constitutionally permissible. In Point I of this Brief, we established that the arrest of George McCray was a valid arrest and therefore, Officers Johnson and Arnold were lawfully entitled to search him and seize the contraband narcotics.

The sole remaining question is whether the manner in which the search was conducted was such that it was shocking to the conscience (Br. 9-99).

The petitioner suggests that because of the extremely cold weather that it was incumbent upon the officers to take him to the police station before making the search (Br. 30). While in some situations this may have been possible, it is not when dealing with narcotics.

In Rovairo v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, Mr. Justice Clark noted (p. 67) that drugs come in small pills or powder and are packaged in glassine capsule containers which may easily be concealed. The possibility of the destruction or secreting of such contraband is ever present. The time of the search is of the essence. In the case at bar this factor is noted by the attempt of the petitioner to hide the contraband under the seat and thus avoid detection (Tr. 17). Every moment that the officers allowed to pass would give the accused that much more of an opportunity to rid himself of the evidence.

In considering petitioner's allegation of shocking conduct on the part of the police officers we must again consider the credibility of the witnesses in relation to the facts surrounding the search. The petitioner alleged that they made him remove his clothing in the squad car and then forced him out of the car with only his underwear and his pants half on (Tr. 7). The officers testified that the search took place within the car and that the petitioner was not removed from the car until they noticed his attempt to hide the packets under the seat. Officer Arnold even said to the accused, "Get in the car. It is too cold out." (Tr. 17).

It is evident from the facts surrounding this arrest that the police officers would have been negligent if they did not conduct a search at the time of the arrest. The search conducted was commensurate with the nature of the crime. It may be unfortunate that it was a very cold morning, but in performing the required search the officers did not perform any acts which a reasonable man could possibly consider to shock the conscience.

Conclusion.

The People of the State of Illinois respectfully pray that the decision of the Supreme Court of the State of Illinois, affirming the conviction of George McCray for possession of narcotics be affirmed.

The People of the State of Illinois have established that the arrest of George McCray was constitutionally valid for it was predicated upon information supplied by a reliable informant, who based this information on personal observation of a crime being committed. The information supplied by the informant was fully corroborated by the surrounding facts and circumstances attendant to the arrest.

The People of the State of Illinois further established that the State was not required to divulge the identity nor produce the informant in this case for the informant did not participate in any manner in the perpetration of the crime of possession of narcotics of which George McCray was accused. It further established that this application of the governmental privilege of non-disclosure is predicated on sound public policy.

Finally, the People of the State of Illinois established that the search of George McCray, subsequent to the valid arrest, was performed in a manner which was commensurate with the nature of the offense and that the conduct of the officers can not by any means be characterized as shocking to the conscience.

Wherefore, the People of the State of Illinois pray that this Court will affirm the arrest and conviction of the petitioner in order to establish reasonable guidelines and standards for the use of informers in the combat of crime, and especially in the area of narcotic traffic, to the ultimate benefit of all of the People of the United States.

Misc. No. 159

GEORGE MCCRAY,

Petitioner,

vs.

THE PEOPLE OF THE STATE OF ILLINOIS,

Respondent.

On Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Illinois.

BRIEF OF STATE OF CALIFORNIA, AMICUS CURIAE

REASONS FOR FILING AN AMICUS CURIAE BRIEF

For the reasons set forth below the State of California is concerned with, and may be affected by, the ultimate disposition of McCray v. Illinois now pending before this Court (No. 159).

The State of California in 1965 enacted a statute, Code of Civil Procedure section 1881.1 which provides as follows:

> "In any preliminary hearing, criminal trial, or other criminal proceeding, for violation of any provision of Division 10 (commencing with Section 11000) of the Health and Safety Code, evidence of information communicated to a peace officer by a confidential informant, who is not a material witness to the guilt or innocence of the accused of the offense charged, shall be admissible on the issue of reasonable cause to make an arrest or search without requiring that the name or identity of the informant be disclosed if the judge or magistrate is satisfied, based upon evidence produced in open court, out of the presence of the jury, that such information was received from a reliable informant and in his discretion does not require such disclosure. [Added Stats. 1965 c. 937, p....., § 1.]"

The constitutionality of this legislative enactment by California became the subject matter of litigation and was decided adversely to the State of California in the California District Court of Appeal (see Martin v. Superior Court, 242 A.C.A. 573, 51 Cal. Rptr. 567 [1966], which is referred to in the "Brief for Petitioner" at page 74). Subsequent to the rendering of this decision the California Supreme Court granted a hearing thus nullifying the opinion of the District Court of Appeal. (For the effect of a granting of a hearing in the State of California see People v. Woods, 19 Cal. App. 2d 556, 560, 65 P. 2d 940 [1937].) This matter was thereafter argued before the California Supreme Court on October 6, 1966, at which time the California Supreme Court deferred the ultimate decision pending the outcome of McCray v. Illinois in this Court.

Counsel for the State of California has researched the law of Illinois relative to the disclosure of an informant who is not a material witness on the issue of guilt of the defendant and based on the opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois in People v. McCray (33 Ill. 2d 66, 210 N.E. 2d 161 [1965]) believes that the rule established by the judiciary in the State of Illinois is comparable to the rule established by the legislative branch of government in California as set forth in Code of Civil Procedure section 1881.1, quoted above. It appears that the highest court of the State of Illinois has declared that the disclosure of the identity of an informant who is not a material witness on the issue of the guilt of the defendant need not be disclosed if there is sufficient evidence presented to the trial judge so as to satisfy the judge, based upon his own independent judgment, that the police officer who relied upon the informant's information properly concluded that the informant was a reliable person and that his information in the case at bar was also reliable. This rule of law is comparable to California Code of Civil Procedure section 1881.1.

In addition to reading the law of Illinois as set forth in the reported cases, counsel for the State of California has read and considered the briefs filed in the Supreme Court of Illinois by the parties in People v. McCray and has also read the "Brief for Petitioner" filed by petitioner McCray after certiorari was granted by this Court.

Based on the facts set forth above, counsel for the State of California believes that the ultimate disposition by this Court of McCray v. Illinois may be determinative of the cause of action now pending in the California Supreme Court entitled Martin v. Superior Court.

The background of the issue now posed in the California Supreme Court has, in part, been summarized in the Brief for Petitioner at pages 63 through 74. We believe, however, that because the summary is not entirely complete and accurate and because the background surrounding the question of disclosure in California is quite different from that surrounding disclosure in Illinois, the filing of an amicus curiae brief by the State of California will give this Court an opportunity to consider the experience of another state in attempting to resolve the delicate constitutional questions presented by McCray v. Illinois, as well as giving this court an opportunity to evaluate what effect its disposition of McCray v. Illinois may have upon states other than Illinois.

For these reasons we set forth below the experience of the State of California and the considerations which California urges this Court weigh in achieving the proper constitutional balance required to decide this case.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

I
INTRODUCTION

Summary of the narrow but vital issue which is discussed in the brief of amicus curiae together with the resolution of this issue proposed by amicus curiae.

The proper rule we urge be adopted in this case is that a trial court should be permitted to refuse to require disclosure if there is convincing evidence of probable cause for an arrest presented to that court at a hearing during which the defendant is given full opportunity to cross-examine the police in all areas except those which relate directly to the identity of the informant.

II
PRECEDENT

The experience of California with regard to the disclosure of the identity of informants whose information relates solely to probable cause for an arrest and search and seizure incidental thereto together with the prior cases decided by this court indicate that disclosure should not be compelled in every case where such information is relied upon by the police.

III POLICY

The disclosure of the identity of an informant is not an essential attribute of a fair hearing conducted to determine the existence of probable cause for an arrest based upon information received from an informant.

ARGUMENT

I

INTRODUCTION

The fundamental issue posed by this case is whether or not the informant system shall remain a vital part of the arsenal of society or whether through judicial action it shall be declared once and for all to be outlawed and prohibited by the constitution. The question here is whether the informant system shall live or die, for this court deals in McCray v. Illinois, not with one of the peripheral appendages of the informant system, but rather with the heart of that system.

As stated by Wigmore in his treatise on evidence:

> "A genuine privilege, on the fundamental principle stated supra §2285, must be recognized for the identity of persons supplying the government with information concerning the commission of crimes.[1] Communications of this kind ought to receive encouragement. They are discouraged if the informer's identity is disclosed. Whether an informer is motivated by good citizenship, promise of leniency or prospect of pecuniary reward, he will usually condition his cooperation on an assurance of anonymity—to protect himself and his family from harm, to preclude adverse social reactions and to avoid the risk of defamation or malicious prosecution actions against him. The government also has an interest in nondisclosure of the identity of its informers. Law enforcement officers often depend upon professional informers to furnish them with a flow of information about criminal activities.

> Revelation of the dual role played by such persons ends their usefullness to the government and discourages others from entering into a like relationship." Wigmore on Evidence (McNaughton rev. 1961) §2374, pp. 761-762; footnote omitted; emphasis in original.

We submit, however, that nondisclosure of the identity of the informant does not strike at the heart of the protection afforded by the Fourth Amendment against unreasonable searches and seizures so long as the informant is not a material witness on the issue of the guilt of the defendant and so long as the trial judge, in the sound exercise of his discretion, is convinced by evidence presented in open court and subject to cross-examination that there was a proper basis for the police officer believing that the informant was reliable and that there was a proper basis for the police officer believing that the information provided by the informant in the particular case at issue was also reliable. As we understand the law established by the judiciary in Illinois and the legislature in California, there is no absolute right not to disclose the name of an informant, but rather the trial judge after hearing evidence presented in open court and subject to cross-examination must have before him a basis for concluding that the disclosure of the informant is not necessary in light of clear and convincing evidence that the informant is reliable and his information is reliable. We do not discuss in this brief the circumstances under which such discretion to require disclosure should be exercised but rather urge in this brief that this court should permit the exercise of such discretion and only overturn a state conviction when the abuse of such discretion is such as to constitute a violation of some protection afforded by the constitution to those accused of crime.[1]

This constitutional issue of whether disclosure should be discretionary, subject to review of alleged abuses of discretion constituting alleged constitutional infractions, can best be analyzed by probing precedent and principle.

II
PRECEDENT

A. California

The requirement in California that there be disclosure of the identity of an informant whose sole usefulness relates to the legality of a search and seizure, as distinguished from guilt or innocence, was first established in this state in Priestly v. Superior Court, 50 Cal. 2d 812, 330 P. 2d 39 (1958). At that time the prohibition against illegal searches and seizures was still deemed to be a matter subject to the exercise of supervisory powers by the states, since Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 6 L. Ed. 2d 1081, 81 S. Ct. 1684 (1961), had not been decided as of that date. Since California courts pursuant to their supervisory powers had held that illegally seized evidence would no longer be admissible in California, Priestly was a further implementation of that supervisory power.

As distinguished from the supervisory basis of Priestly, California had also adopted the rule that where the informant was material to the issue of guilt or innocence, either as a participant in the crime or as a per-cipient witness, disclosure was required. See People v. McShann, 50 Cal. 2d 802, 330 P. 2d 33 (1958). However, such disclosure was required on a constitutional basis. See Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53, 1 L. Ed. 2d 639, 77 S. Ct. 623 (1957), relied upon in People v. McShann, supra.

[1]It should be noted, however, that the opinion of the Supreme Court of Illinois in the present case appears to set forth sufficient facts disclosed by the prosecution to warrant upholding the trial judge's determination not to require disclosure.

Because Priestly was poised on a supervisory basis whereas McShann was poised on a constitutional basis, the California Supreme Court drew a distinction between the two in People v. Keener, 55 Cal. 2d 714, 12 Cal. Rptr. 859 (1961). There it was held that so long as the informer was not "a material witness with respect to facts directly relating to the defendant's guilt" (55 Cal. 2d at 724, 12 Cal. Rptr. at 864), his identity need not be disclosed if the People conduct the search pursuant to a search warrant based upon an affidavit containing information supplied by an undisclosed, but reliable, informant.

The experience in the State of California under this state of the law, whereby if the police proceeded with a warrant the informant need not be disclosed and if they proceeded without a warrant the informant must be disclosed, was found by the legislature to be such that a change in the law was required in order to properly enforce the laws regulating narcotics in this state. The history of this change in the law is clearly set forth in a letter from the Attorney General of California to the Governor of this state, a copy of which is attached hereto as an appendix and which has been submitted to the California Supreme Court in its consideration of Martin v. Superior Court. The report of the Assembly Interim Committee which urged the passage of the bill

> "The committee recognizes a legitimate concern among law enforcement officials for protection of their informants. Furthermore, since the use of informants is especially valuable in narcotics prosecutions, there is a special need to shield those informants from disclosure to as great a degree possible compatible with the constitutional rights of the defendant.
> "The committee is anxious, however, that the evidence presented to justify the reliability of the informant be substantial evidence presented in open court and not in closed proceedings, and it has added language to the bill to that effect." (Report of the Assembly Interim Committee on Criminal Procedure, January 1, 1965, Volume 22, Number 8, Page 53.)

We submit the fact that California concluded that a system of absolute disclosure required a partial change is evidence that a requirement that the states be compelled under any and all circumstances to disclose informants whose information is relied upon solely for the purposes of justifying an arrest and search and seizure incidental thereto is a factor which would be weighed upon the scales in the delicate balance between the rights of society and the rights of the individual in this case. We will discuss in Part III of this brief the reasons why California might have concluded that the rules established by its judiciary have not proven satisfactory enough to warrant their continuance in the attempt to control the use and abuse of narcotics.

B. Prior United States Supreme Court Cases

Since we believe that counsel for the parties in this case will undoubtedly discuss the prior cases decided by this court which are applicable to the case at bar, we shall not set forth herein any extensive discussion thereof. (It should be noted that, as yet, we have not had an opportunity to review the brief to be filed by the State of Illinois in this court.) However, we do wish to offer some brief comments on some prior cases in order that this court may understand the position we urge herein.

The position we urge is that this court re-affirm what it decided in Roviaro v. United States, 353 U.S. 53, 1 L. Ed. 2d 639, 77 S. Ct. 623 (1957). In that case this court stated as follows:

> "We believe that no fixed rule with respect to disclosure is justifiable. The problem is one that calls for balancing the public interest in protecting the flow of information against the individual's right to prepare his defense. Whether a proper balance renders nondisclosure erroneous must depend on the particular circumstances of each case, taking into consideration the crime charged, the possible defenses, the possible significance of the informer's testimony, and other relevant factors." 353 U.S. 62, 1 L. Ed. 2d at 646, 77 S. Ct. at 628-629.

The principle enunciated in Roviaro v. United States was recently re-affirmed in Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U.S.

108, 12 L. Ed. 2d 723, 84 S. Ct. 1509 (1964), wherein this court stated as follows:

> "Although an affidavit may be based on hearsay information and need not reflect the direct personal observations of the affiant, Jones v. United States, 362 U.S. 257, 80 S.Ct. 725, 4 L.Ed.2d 697, the magistrate must be informed of some of the underlying circumstances from which the informant concluded that the narcotics were where he claimed they were, and some of the underlying circumstances from which the officer concluded that the informant, whose identity need not be disclosed, see Rugendorf v. United States, 376 U.S. 528, 84 S.Ct. 825, was 'credible' or his information 'reliable.'" (378 U.S. at 114, 12 L.Ed. 2d 729, 84 S. Ct. at 1514 (1964); emphasis added.)

Finally, it should be noted that if Roviaro is again re-affirmed in the instant case, the holding of Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400, 13 L. Ed. 2d 923, 85 S. Ct. 1065 (1965), must necessarily be inapplicable to this case. The constitutional provision relied upon in Pointer v. Texas and made applicable to the states by that case (the right to confrontation) was always applicable to federal prosecutions. Thus if the right to confrontation were applicable to the instant case, it should have been applied, but was implicitly rejected, in Roviaro v. United States when this Court permitted in a federal prosecution a balance of the "public interest in protecting the flow of information against the individual's right to prepare his defense." 353 U.S. at 62, 1 L. Ed. 2d at 646, 77 S. Ct. at 628-629.

C. Other Jurisdiction

Just as we expect the parties will discuss the applicable cases decided by this court, we have similar expectations with regard to applicable cases from jurisdictions other than California. However, we do wish to call this Court's attention to a recent decision by the Supreme Court of New Jersey which contains an extensive review of applicable law. See State v. Burnett, 42 N.J. 377, 201 A. 2d 39 (1964).

III
PRINCIPLE

It must be assumed that when the California Legislature enacted Code of Civil Procedure section 1881.1 it was aware of the balance that the California Supreme Court had sought in respect to the disclosure of informants in Priestly v. Superior Court and People v. Keener. As noted previously, the California Supreme Court had made disclosure of an informant's name mandatory when law enforcement proceeded without a search warrant and had made it discretionary when law enforcement proceeded to engage in a search with a search warrant.

After a number of years of compliance with this system of law, the legislature of California could rationally have determined that such a system did not carry out the purpose that it was designed to foster. The legislature could have concluded that even though informants were being disclosed where necessary, they were of no use to the defense since the informant either was never called as a witness by the defendant or could no longer be located by the defendant. As stated in a comment recently appearing in Volume 53 of the California Law Review at page 855:

> ". . . there are numerous examples in the case law where disclosure has been ordered, thus depriving police of an informer's future services and discouraging potential sources of information, yet the informer has not subsequently testified."

The legislature could further have concluded that not only was there no benefit to the defendant but that in those cases where law enforcement refused to disclose the informant, the ability of society to prosecute those who unquestionably violated the law was unduly hampered. In this connection, it must be remembered that we deal in this case with the question not of guilt or innocence, but of probable cause.

The theory underlying the request for revealing the identity of an informant, it must be remembered, is to determine whether or not the police officer is deliberately lying. We submit, however, that the requirement that the identity of the informant be disclosed does not in the main, serve this purpose. In the first place, if an officer desires to lie he could just as well make up a reliable informant whose name he does not know as a reliable informant whose name he does know. In California, for example, the use of information from an anonymous reliable informant is permissible. See People v. Prewitt, 52 Cal. 2d 330, 341 P. 2d 1 (1959).

Furthermore, the mere fact that the defendant knows the identity of the informant and is able to question the informant does not truly aid the defendant since at best, the informant could say (a) I lied to the officer, or (b) I did not tell the officer anything. If the informant lied to the officer, the officer still had probable cause even though what he was told was false, so long as he had a reasonable basis for believing that what he was told was true. Thus the issue is not whether the informant speaks the truth but whether the officer had a reasonable basis for believing that the informant spoke the truth. If the informant says he did not tell the officer anything, an issue of credibility will be raised. We submit that this issue will normally be resolved in favor of the police officer rather than the informant and that such a resolution is just common sense. As stated by the California Supreme Court in People v. Prewitt, 52 Cal. 2d at 338, 341 P. 2d at 5, "It cannot be presumed, however, that officers will commit perjury . . ." The motivation for the informant lying is evident, however. He may be afraid for his own safety. Furthermore, if the officer, in fact, were lying, does it not seem reasonable that the same officer might procure the favorable testimony of the informant by offering him certain inducements. In short, in spite of all the safeguards that society may interpose, if an officer intends to lie he will find means to evade the effect of a rule requiring disclosure. The honest officer will be the only officer who will suffer for he will, where necessity requires it, refuse to disclose the informant and as a result society will suffer from its inability to prosecute. As stated by the California legislative committee which urged passage of the bill finally enacted into law in California:

> "The committee recognizes a legitimate concern among law enforcement officials for protection of their informants. Furthermore, since the use of informants is especially valuable in narcotics prosecutions, there is a special need to shield those informants from disclosure to as great a degree possible compatible with the constitutional rights of the defendant." (Report of the Assembly Interim Committee on Criminal Procedure, January 1, 1965, Volume 22, Number 8, Page 53; see also the letter of California Attorney General Lynch attached hereto as an appendix.)

We submit that the United States Constitution compels only that a defendant whose arrest is based upon information received from an informant be afforded a reasonable opportunity to determine whether the officer acted with probable cause under the circumstances of the case. This we submit can be determined by permitting the defendant adequate cross-examination in all areas relating to the informant except his identity. We believe the judicial officers who must in the end make the ultimate determination as to whether the officer is telling the truth will properly be able to perform this difficult task of segregating truth from falsehood which is present when anyone takes the stand, be he police officer, defendant, or disinterested witness. By the use of extensive cross-examination by the defendant, as was apparently permitted by the Illinois judge in People v. McCray, the judge will be able to determine whether and when the identity of the informant is of such crucial importance as to require the disclosure of the informant so as to be certain that no violation of the Constitution has occurred. We believe that the judiciary, sitting as a trier of fact in the trial court, is capable of making this decision without a requirement that in every case where probable cause is based solely upon information supplied by an informant the identity of that informant must be disclosed.

APPENDIX

June 24, 1965

Honorable Edmund G. Brown
Governor of the State of California
State Capitol Building
Sacramento, California

Dear Governor:

Assembly Bill 979 authored by Assemblyman Winton has recently been passed by the California Legislature and is now on your desk. Assembly Bill 979 provides, in effect, that information received from a known, unidentified informant, whose reliability has been proven to the satisfaction of a judge, constitutes probable cause for arrest. The bill is limited to narcotics cases and would not affect the right to disclosure of the identity of an informant who is a participant in a narcotics transaction or otherwise a material witness to guilt or innocence.

It should be observed that this bill has received long and careful study prior to its passage by the Legislature. The original bill was introduced during the 1963 session of the Legislature at which time the Assembly Criminal Procedures Committee sent it to interim study. At the Interim Committee hearing Stanley Mosk, former Attorney General, pointed out that the bill failed to specify the nature of the proceedings at which the judge would determine the reliability of the informant and that a defendant might be denied the right to confront and cross-examine witnesses. Former Attorney General Mosk therefore recommended that the bill be amended to make it clear that evidence of the reliability of the informant must be presented in open court and that the testifying officer could be cross-examined fully as to the facts establishing reliability.

By such modification the bill respects the constitutional rights of a defendant and also encourages the free flow of information to law enforcement officers. Thereafter the Assembly Criminal Procedures Committee in its interim report recommended that the bill as amended be passed by the 1965 session of the California Legislature.

The substantial protections against unlawful search present in the warrant procedure have been provided for in Assembly Bill 979. Thus the validity of the search is reviewed by a judge, not a police officer, and the search or arrest is upheld only when the judge is satisfied that there is probable cause, i.e., that informant is reliable. In addition the judge may require disclosure of the informant or even require the informant's presence. Since the Supreme Court in the Keener case determined that these safeguards constituted substantial protection against unlawful search it is clear that the similar protections incorporated in Assembly Bill 979 also offer substantial protections against unlawful search.

In conferring with law enforcement officials throughout the State, they have uniformly related that their experience has been that the disclosure requirement has resulted in the dismissal of many cases as well as the termination of investigations prior to the filing of a criminal complaint. Since the use of informants is especially valuable in narcotics prosecutions there is a special need to shield those informants from disclosure to as great a degree possible compatible with the constitutional rights of the defendant. By protecting the identity of an informant Assembly Bill 979 would foster the communication of information by reliable informants and thereby assist law enforcement in obtaining evidence of crime.

I therefore strongly urge that you give favorable consideration to this bill.

Very truly yours,

THOMAS C. LYNCH
Attorney General

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 159.—October Term, 1966.

George McCray, Petitioner, v. State of Illinois. | On Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Illinois.

[March 20, 1967.]

Mr. Justice Stewart delivered the opinion the Court.

The petitioner was arrested in Chicago, Illinois, on the morning of January 16, 1964, for possession of narcotics. The Chicago police officers who made the arrest found a package containing heroin on his person and he was indicted for its unlawful possession. Prior to trial he filed a motion to suppress the heroin as evidence against him, claiming that the police had acquired it in an unlawful search and seizure in violation of the Fourth and Fourteenth Amendments. See Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U. S. 643. After a hearing, the court denied the motion, and the petitioner was subsequently convicted upon the evidence of the heroin the arresting officers had found in his possession. The judgment of conviction was affirmed by the Supreme Court of Illinois,[1] and we granted certiorari to consider the petitioner's claim that the hearing on his motion to suppress was constitutionally defective.[2]

The petitioner's arrest occurred near the intersection of 49th Street and Calumet Avenue at about seven in the morning. At the hearing on the motion to suppress, he testified that up until a half hour before he was arrested he had been at "a friend's house" about a block away, that after leaving the friend's house he had "walked with a lady from 48th to 48th and South Park," and that, as he approached 49th Street and Calumet Avenue, "[t]he Officers stopped me going through the alley." "The officers," he said, "did not show me a search warrant for my person or an arrest warrant for my arrest." He said the officers then searched him and found the narcotics in question.[3] The petitioner did not identify the "friend" nor the "lady," and neither of them appeared as a witness.

The arresting officers then testified. Officer Jackson stated that he and two fellow officers had had a conversation with an informant on the morning of January 16 in their unmarked police car. The officer said that the informant had told them that the petitioner, with whom Jackson was acquainted, "was selling narcotics and had narcotics on his person and that he could be found in the vicinity of 47th and Calumet at this particular time." Jackson said that he and his fellow officers drove to that vicinity in the police car and that when they spotted the petitioner, the informant pointed him out and then departed on foot. Jackson stated that the officers observed the petitioner walking with a woman, then separating from her and meeting briefly with a man, then proceeding alone, and finally, after seeing the police car, "hurriedly walk[ing] between two buildings." "At this point," Jackson testified, "my partner and myself got out of the car and informed him we had information he had narcotics on his person, placed him in the police vehicle at this point." Jackson stated that the officers then searched the petitioner and found the heroin in a cigarette package.

[3] The weather was "real cold," and the petitioner testified he "had on three coats." In order to conduct the search, the arresting officers required the petitioner to remove some of his clothing, but even the petitioner's version of the circumstances of the search did not disclose any conduct remotely akin to that condemned by this Court in Rochin v. California, 342 U. S. 165.

Jackson testified that he had been acquainted with the informant for approximately a year, that during this period the informant had supplied him with information about narcotics activities "fifteen, sixteen times at least," that the information had proved to be accurate and had resulted in numerous arrests and convictions. On cross-examination, Jackson was even more specific as to the informant's previous reliability, giving the names of people who had been convicted of narcotics violations as the result of information the informant had supplied. When Jackson was asked for the informant's name and address, counsel for the State objected, and the objection was sustained by the court.[4]

Officer Arnold gave substantially the same account of the circumstances of the petitioner's arrest and search, stating that the informant had told the officers that the petitioner "was selling narcotics and had narcotics on his person now in the vicinity of 47th and Calumet." The informant, Arnold testified, "said he had observed [the petitioner] selling narcotics to various people, meaning various addicts, in the area of 47th and Calumet." Arnold testified that he had known the informant "roughly two years," that the informant had given him information concerning narcotics "20 or 25 times," and that the information had resulted in convictions. Arnold too was asked on cross-examination for the informant's name and address, and objections to these questions were sustained by the court.

"Mr. Engerman: Objection, Your Honor.

"The Court: State for the record the reasons for your objection.

"Mr. Engerman: Judge, based upon the testimony of the officer so far that they had used this informant for approximately a year, he has worked with this individual, in the interest of the public, I see no reason why the officer should be forced to disclose the name of the informant, to cause harm or jeopardy to an individual who has cooperated with the police. The City of Chicago have a tremendous problem with narcotics. If the police are not able to withhold the name of the informant they will not be able to get informants. They are not willing to risk their lives if their names become known.

There can be no doubt, upon the basis of the circumstances related by Officers Jackson and Arnold, that there was probable cause to sustain the arrest and incidental search in this case. Draper v. United States, 358 U. S. 307. Unlike the situation in Beck v. Ohio, 379 U. S. 89, each of the officers in this case described with specificity "what the informer actually said, and why the officer thought the information was credible." 379 U. S. at 97. The testimony of each of the officers informed the court of the "underlying circumstances from which the informant concluded that the narcotics were where he claimed they were, and some of the underlying circumsances from which the officer concluded that the informant . . . was 'credible' or his information 'reliable.'" Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U. S. 108, 114. See United States v. Ventresca, 380 U. S. 102. Upon the basis of those circumstances, along with the officers' personal observations of the petitioner, the court was fully justified in holding that at the time the officers made the arrest, "the facts and circumstances within their knowledge and of which they had reasonably trustworthy information were sufficient to warrant a prudent man in believing that the petitioner had committed or was committing an offense. Brinegar v. United States, 338 U. S. 160, 175–176; Henry v. United States, 361 U. S. 98, 102." Beck

v. Ohio, supra, at 91. It is the petitioner's claim, however, that even though the officers' sworn testimony fully supported a finding of probable cause for the arrest and search, the state court nonetheless violated the Constitution when it sustained objections to the petitioner's questions as to the identity of the informant. We cannot agree.

In permitting the officers to withhold the informant's identity, the court was following well-settled Illinois law. When the issue is not guilt or innocence, but, as here, the question of probable cause for an arrest or search, the Illinois Supreme Court has held that police officers need not invariably be required to disclose an informant's identity if the trial judge is convinced, by evidence submitted in open court and subject to cross-examination, that the officers did rely in good faith upon credible information supplied by a reliable informant.[5] This Illinois evidentiary rule is consistent with the law of many other States.[6] In California, the State Legislature in 1965 enacted a statute adopting just such a rule for cases like the one before us:

> "[I]n any preliminary hearing, criminal trial, or other criminal proceeding, for violation of any provision of Division 10 (commencing with Section 11000) of the Health and Safety Code, evidence of informa-

California Code of Evidence, § 1042 (c).[7]

The reasoning of the Supreme Court of New Jersey in judicially adopting the same basic evidentiary rule was instructively expressed by Chief Justice Weintraub in State v. Burnett, 42 N. J. 377, 201 A. 2d 39:

> "If a defendant may insist upon disclosure of the informant in order to test the truth of the officer's statement that there is an informant or as to what the informant related or as to the informant's reliability, we can be sure that every defendant will demand disclosure. He has nothing to lose and the prize may be suppression of damaging evidence if the State cannot afford to reveal its source, as is so often the case. And since there is no way to test the good faith of a defendant who presses the demand, we must assume the routine demand would have to be routinely granted. The result would be that the State could use the informant's information only as a lead and could search only if it could gather adequate evidence of probable cause apart from the informant's data. Perhaps that approach would sharpen investigatorial techniques, but we doubt that there would be enough talent and time to cope with crime upon that basis. Rather we accept the premise that the informer is a vital part of society's defensive arsenal. The basic rule protecting his identity rests upon that belief.

[7] In the present case California has filed a helpful amicus brief, advising us that the validity of this provision is now before the Supreme Court of California. Martin v. Superior Court, 65 A. C. No. 12 (LA 29078). The statute was enacted to modify that court's decision in Priestly v. Superior Court, 50 Cal. 2d 812, 330 P. 2d 39. See also Ford v. City of Jackson, 158 Miss. 616, 121 So. 278.

"We must remember also that we are not dealing with the trial of the criminal charge itself. There the need for a truthful verdict outweighs society's need for the informer privilege. Here, however, the accused seeks to avoid the truth. The very purpose of a motion to suppress is to escape the inculpatory thrust of evidence in hand, not because its probative force is diluted in the least by the mode of seizure, but rather as a sanction to compel enforcement officers to respect the constitutional security of all of us under the Fourth Amendment. State v. Smith, 37 N. J. 481, 486 (1962). If the motion to suppress is denied, defendant will still be judged upon the untarnished truth.

"The Fourth Amendment is served if a judicial mind passes upon the existence of probable cause. Where the issue is submitted upon an application for a warrant, the magistrate is trusted to evaluate the credibility of the affiant in an ex parte proceeding. As we have said, the magistrate is concerned, not with whether the informant lied, but with whether the affiant is truthful in his recitation of what he was told. If the magistrate doubts the credibility of the affiant, he may require that the informant be identified or even produced. It seems to us that the same approach is equally sufficient where the search was without a warrant, that is to say, that it should rest entirely with the judge who hears the motion to suppress to decide whether he needs such disclosure as to the informant in order to decide whether the officer is a believable witness." 42 N. J., at 385–388, 201 A. 2d, at 43–45.

What Illinois and her sister States have done is no more than recognize a well-established testimonial privilege, long familiar to the law of evidence. Professor Wigmore, not known as an enthusiastic advocate of testimonial privileges generally,* has described that privilege in these words:

> "A genuine privilege, on . . . fundamental principle . . . , must be recognized for the identity of persons supplying the government with information concerning the commission of crimes. Communications of this kind ought to receive encouragement. They are discouraged if the informer's identity is disclosed. Whether an informer is motivated by good citizenship, promise of leniency or prospect of pecuniary reward, he will usually condition his cooperation on an assurance of anonymity—to protect himself and his family from harm, to preclude adverse social reactions and to avoid the risk of defamation or malicious prosecution actions against him. The government also has an interest in nondisclosure of the identity of its informers. Law enforcement officers often depend upon professional informers to furnish them with a flow of information about criminal activities. Revelation of the dual role played by such persons ends their usefulness

"That the government has this privilege is well established, and its soundness cannot be questioned." (Footnotes omitted.) 8 Wigmore, Evidence § 2374 (McNaughton rev. 1961).

In the federal courts the rules of evidence in criminal trials are governed "by the principles of the common law as they may be interpreted by the courts of the United States in the light of reason and experience."[9] This Court, therefore, has the ultimate task of defining the scope to be accorded to the various common law evidentiary privileges in the trial of federal criminal cases. See Hawkins v. United States, 358 U. S. 74. This is a task which is quite different, of course, from the responsibility of constitutional adjudication. In the exercise of this supervisory jurisdiction the Court had occasion 10 years ago, in Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, to give thorough consideration to one aspect of the informer's privilege, the privilege itself having long been recognized in the federal judicial system.[10]

The Roviaro case involved the informer's privilege, not at a preliminary hearing to determine probable cause for an arrest or search, but at the trial itself where the issue was the fundamental one of innocence or guilt. The petitioner there had been brought to trial upon a two-count federal indictment charging sale and transportation of narcotics. According to the prosecution's evidence, the informer had been an active participant in the crime. He "had taken a material part in bringing about the possession of certain drugs by the accused, had been present with the accused at the occurrence of the alleged crime, and might be a material witness as to whether the accused knowingly transported the drugs as charged." 353 U. S., at 55. The trial court nonetheless denied a defense motion to compel the prosecution to disclose the informer's identity.

This Court held that where, in an actual trial of a federal criminal case,

> "'the disclosure of an informer's identity . . . is relevant and helpful to the defense of an accused, or is essential to a fair determination of a cause, the privilege must give way. In these situations the trial court may require disclosure and, if the Government withholds the information, dismiss the action. . . .' [353 U. S., at 60–61.] [Footnotes omitted.]
>
> "We believe that no fixed rule with respect to disclosure is justifiable. The problem is one that calls for balancing the public interest in protecting the flow of information against the individual's right to prepare his defense. Whether a proper balance renders nondisclosure erroneous must depend on the particular circumstances of each case, taking into consideration the crime charged, the possible defenses, the possible significance of the informer's testimony, and other relevant factors." 353 U. S., at 62.

The Court's opinion then carefully reviewed the particular circumstances of Roviaro's trial, pointing out that the informer's "possible testimony was highly relevant . . . ," that he "might have disclosed an entrapment . . . ," "might have thrown doubt upon petitioner's identity or on the identity of the package . . . ," "might have testified to petitioner's possible lack of knowledge of the contents of the package that he 'transported' . . . ," and that the "informer was the sole participant, other than the accused, in the transaction charged." 353 U. S., at 63–64. The Court concluded "that, under these circumstances, the trial court committed prejudicial error in permitting the Government to withhold the identity of its undercover employee in the face of repeated demands by the accused for his disclosure." 353 U. S., at 65.

What Roviaro thus makes clear is that this Court was unwilling to impose any absolute rule requiring disclosure of an informer's identity even in formulating evidentiary rules for federal criminal trials. Much less has the Court ever approached the formulation of a federal evidentiary rule of compulsory disclosure where the issue is the preliminary one of probable cause, and guilt or innocence is not at stake. Indeed, we have repeatedly made clear that federal officers need not disclose an informer's identity in applying for an arrest or search warrant. As was said in United States v. Ventresca, 380 U. S. 102, 108, we have "recognized that 'an affidavit may be based on hearsay information and need not reflect the direct personal observations of the affiant,' so long as the magistrate is 'informed of some of the underlying circumstances' supporting the affiant's conclusions and his belief that any informant involved 'whose identity need not be disclosed . . . was "credible" or his information "reliable."' Aguilar v. Texas, supra, at 114." (Emphasis added.) See also Jones v. United States, 362 U. S. 257, 271–272; Rugendorf v. United States, 376 U. S. 528, 533.[11] And [11] Some federal courts have applied the same rule of nondisclosure in both warrant and nonwarrant cases. Smith v. United States, 358 F. 2d 833 (C. A. D. C. Cir.); Jones v. United States, 326 F. 2d 124 (C. A. 9th Cir.), cert. denied, 377 U. S. 956; United States v. One 1957 Ford Ranchero Pickup, 265 F. 2d 21 (C. A. 10th Cir.). Other federal courts, however, have distinguished between these two classes of cases and have required the identification of informants in non-just this Term we have taken occasion to point out that a rule virtually prohibiting the use of informers would "severely hamper the Government" in enforcement of the narcotics laws. Lewis v. United States, 385 U. S. 206, 210.

In sum, the Court in the exercise of its power to formulate evidentiary rules for federal criminal cases has consistently declined to hold that an informer's identity need always be disclosed in a federal criminal trial, let alone in a preliminary hearing to determine probable cause for an arrest or search. Yet we are now asked to hold that the Constitution somehow compels Illinois to abolish the informer's privilege from its law of evidence, and to require disclosure of the informer's warrant cases. United States v. Robinson, 325 F. 2d 391 (C. A. 2d Cir.); Cochran v. United States, 291 F. 2d 633 (C. A. 8th Cir.). Cf. Wilson v. United States, 59 F. 2d 390 (C. A. 3d Cir.). See Comment, Informer's Word as the Basis for Probable Cause in the Federal Courts, 53 Calif. L. Rev. 840 (1965).

In drawing this distinction some of the federal courts have relied upon a dictum in Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, 61:

"Most of the federal cases involving this limitation on the scope of the informer's privilege have arisen where the legality of a search without a warant is in issue and the communications of an informant are claimed to establish probable cause. In these cases the Government has been required to disclose the identity of the informant unless there was sufficient evidence apart from his confidential communication."

Since there was no probable cause issue in Roviaro, the quoted statement was clearly not necessary for decision. Indeed, an absolute rule of disclosure for probable cause determinations would conflict with the case-by-case approach upon which the Roviaro decision was based. Moreover, the precedent upon which this dictum was grounded furnishes only dubious support. Scher v. United States, 305 U. S. 251, the only decision of this Court which was cited, affirmed the trial judge's refusal to order arresting officers to reveal the source of their information.

identity in every such preliminary hearing where it appears that the officers made the arrest or search in reliance upon facts supplied by an informer they had reason to trust. The argument is based upon the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment, and upon the Sixth Amendment right of confrontation, applicable to the States through the Fourteenth Amendment. Pointer v. Texas, 380 U. S. 400. We find no support for the petitioner's position in either of those constitutional provisions.

The arresting officers in this case testified, in open court, fully and in precise detail as to what the informer told them and as to why they had reason to believe his information was trustworthy. Each officer was under oath. Each was subjected to searching cross-examination. The judge was obviously satisfied that each was telling the truth, and for that reason he exercised the discretion conferred upon him by the established law of Illinois to respect the informer's privilege.

Nothing in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment requires a state court judge in every such hearing to assume the arresting officers are committing perjury. "To take such a step would be quite beyond the pale of this Court's proper function in our federal system. It would be a wholly unjustifiable encroachment by this Court upon the constitutional power of States to promulgate their own rules of evidence . . . in their own state courts . . . ." Spencer v. Texas, —— U. S. ——, ——.

The petitioner does not explain precisely how he thinks his Sixth Amendment right to confrontation and cross-examination was violated by Illinois' recognition of the informer's privilege in this case. If the claim is that the State violated the Sixth Amendment by not producing the informer to testify against the petitioner, then we need no more than repeat the Court's answer to that claim a few weeks ago in Cooper v. California:

> "Petitioner also presents the contention here that he was unconstitutionally deprived of the right to confront a witness against him, because the State did not produce the informant to testify against him. This contention we consider absolutely devoid of merit." — U. S. —, —, note 2.

On the other hand, the claim may be that the petitioner was deprived of his Sixth Amendment right to cross-examine the arresting officers themselves, because their refusal to reveal the informer's identity was upheld. But it would follow from this argument that no witness on cross-examination could ever constitutionally assert a testimonial privilege, including the privilege against compulsory self-incrimination guaranteed by the Constitution itself. We have never given the Sixth Amendment such a construction, and we decline to do so now.

Affirmed.

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

No. 159.—October Term, 1966.

George McCray, Petitioner, v. State of Illinois. | On Writ of Certiorari to the Supreme Court of Illinois.

[March 20, 1967.]

Mr. Justice Douglas, with whom The Chief Justice, Mr. Justice Brennan and Mr. Justice Fortas concur, dissenting.

We have here a Fourth Amendment question concerning the validity of an arrest. If the police see a crime being committed they can of course seize the culprit. If a person is fleeing the scene of a crime, the police can stop him. And there are the cases of "hot pursuit" and other instances of probable cause when the police can make an arrest. But normally an arrest should be made only on a warrant issued by a magistrate on a showing of "probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation," as required by the Fourth Amendment. At least since Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U. S. 643, the States are as much bound by those provisions as is the Federal Government. But for the Fourth Amendment they could fashion the rule for arrests that the Court now approves. With all deference, the requirements of the Fourth Amendment now make that conclusion unconstitutional.

No warrant for the arrest of petitioner was obtained in this case. The police, instead of going to a magistrate and making a showing of "probable cause" based on their informant's tipoff, acted on their own. They, rather than the magistrate, became the arbiters of "probable cause." The Court's approval of that process effectively rewrites the Fourth Amendment.

In Roviaro v. United States, 353 U. S. 53, 61, we held that where a search without a warrant is made on the basis of communications of an informer and the Government claims the police had "probable cause," disclosure of the identity of the informant is normally required. In no other way can the defense show an absence of "probable cause." By reason of Mapp v. Ohio, supra, that rule is now applicable to the States.

In Beck v. Ohio, 379 U. S. 89, 96, we said:

> "An arrest without a warrant bypasses the safeguards provided by an objective predetermination of probable cause, and substitutes instead the far less reliable procedure of an after-the-event justification for the arrest or search, too likely to be subtly influenced by the familiar shortcomings of hindsight judgment."

For that reason we have weighted arrest with warrants more heavily than arrests without warrants. See United States v. Ventresca, 380 U. S. 102, 106. Only through the informer's testimony can anyone other than the arresting officers determine "the persuasiveness of the facts relied on . . . to show probable cause." Aguilar v. Texas, 378 U. S. 108, 113.[1] Without that disclosure neither we nor the lower courts can ever know whether there was "probable cause" for the arrest. Under the present decision we leave the Fourth Amendment exclusively in the custody of the police. As stated by Mr. Justice Schaefer dissenting in People v. Durr, 28 Ill. 2d 308, 318, 192 N. E. 2d 379, 384, unless the identity of the informer is disclosed "the policeman himself conclusively determines the validity of his own arrest." That was the view of the Supreme Court of California in Priestly v. Superior Court, 50 Cal. 2d 812, 330 P. 2d 39, 43:

> "Only by requiring disclosure and giving the defendant an opportunity to present contrary or impeaching evidence as to the truth of the officer's testimony and the reasonableness of his reliance on the informer can the court make a fair determination of the issue. Such a requirement does not unreasonably discourage the free flow of information to law enforcement officers or otherwise impede law enforcement. Actually its effect is to compel independent investigations to verify information given by an informer or to uncover other facts that establish reasonable cause to make an arrest or search."

There is no way to determine the reliability of Old Reliable, the informer, unless he is produced at the trial and cross-examined. Unless he is produced, the Fourth Amendment is entrusted to the tender mercies of the police.[2] What we do today is to encourage arrests and searches without warrants. The whole momentum of criminal law administration should be in precisely the opposite direction, if the Fourth Amendment is to remain a vital force. Except in rare and emergency cases, it requires magistrates to make the findings of "probable cause." We should be mindful of its command that a judicial mind should be interposed between the police and the citizen. We should also be mindful that "disclosure, rather than suppression, of relevant materials ordinarily promotes the proper administration of criminal justice." Dennis v. United States, 384 U. S. 855, 870.

[2] It is not unknown for the arresting officer to misrepresent his connection with the informer, his knowledge of the informer's reliability, or the information allegedly obtained from the informer. See, e. g., United States v. Pearce, 275 F. 2d 318, 322.
